Our hospitals are full of sick, wounded and cri soldiers; but there are comparatively few do and nurses to care for them. Our towns are cro with poor, hungry, suffering people; hundreds of t widows and orphans.

At present we have in our towns over one hun thousand Macedonian refugees, who are sharing with us bread of sorrow and uniting with us in earnest appeals to for speedy relief.

I have come to this country, feeling the great burden on heart of the homeless and poor people I have met in the months and for whom I long to do something. I have left home and children with the very purpose of interesting t who would be used by God as a means to answer the prayer the suffering ones in Bulgaria. If there are any ladies' socie or churches who are interested in this work, I would be very to meet them and give an address as to the true conditi Bulgaria, hoping they will help me go home with a glad hear meet the need of the sufferers. I shall be glad to hear from t who are interested. My address is, care of THE CHRIST HERALD. I expect to be here for two months.

OUR NEW TARIFF LAW

A WELL-KNOWN political writer, in an analysis of the newly enacted law, says: "Is it a substantial revision downward?" is, naturally, the first question to be asked and answered. It is, beyond a doubt. This is conceded by its strongest opponents and is claimed by its sponsors in both houses of Congress.

Moreover, in its passage through the House and Senate, a phenomenon not witnessed before in over half a century, before the Civil War era and after, of high and mounting tariffs, has taken place, a thing considered impossible six months ago by the closest observers and friends of the proposed measure. The Senate has actually reduced, many times substantially, the rates of the bill as it came from the House, and the Conference Committee has resisted the upward pressure in the majority of the bitterly contested schedules. Both these facts are without precedent in modern tariff history.

The keystone of the arch of the high-tariffs since the war has been famous Schedule K, the schedule covering wool and woolens. Around this schedule have raged the hottest contests of the past fifty years of tariff revisions. Beginning with the year 1867, there has been a continuous combination, in one form or another, between the Western wool growers and the Eastern woolen goods manufacturers. This combination, in turn, made combinations with other groups, and heretofore these interlocking groups have formed, with the exception of "free wool" in the act of 1894, an unbreakable chain.

The chain has been broken. Schedule K is shattered. Wool goes upon the free list, beginning December 1 of this year. The rates affecting wool manufacturers do not go into operation till January 1 1914. These concessions were doubtless made chiefly because of the seasonal demand for wool and woolens and the lateness of the enactment of the new bill in the fall season.

An inspection of the comparative rates, Payne and Underwood, shows the extent of the cuts in this schedule, especially as affecting all kinds of woolen garments, underwear, blankets, carpets, etc.

Note blankets. The Payne bill imposed compound (weight and value) duties which aggregated 72.69 per cent. of the foreign market value. The Underwood bill imposes 25 per cent., a reduction under the old tariff rate of 47.69 per cent.

On seamless wool stockings, gloves, and mittens, over $1.20 per dozen pairs, the Payne bill carried 94.03 per cent., the Underwood tariff 30 per cent., a reduction of 64.03 per cent.; wool stockings, machine knit, Payne, 94.03 per cent., Underwood, 20 per cent., a change downward of 74.03 per cent.; cheaper flannels, Payne, 93.29 per cent., Underwood, 25 per cent., a reduction of 68.29 per cent.; women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, and similar goods of wool, Payne, 99.70 per cent., Underwood, 35 per cent., a reduction of 64.79 per cent.; ready-made clothing, all kinds wearing apparel, including shawls, chiefly of wool, Payne, 79.56 per cent., Underwood, 35 per cent., a reduction of 44.56 per cent.

Cloths, knit fabrics, felts, not woven, and manufactures chiefly of wool, Payne 94.03 per cent., Underwood 35 per cent., a reduction of 59.03 per cent.; webbings, suspenders, braces, handings, cords, ribbons of wool or woolen India rubber, Payne 50 cents per pound plus 60 per cent., Underwood 35 per cent., a fall of 47.07 per cent.

The various types of woolen carpets are reduced by such figures as 29.62 per cent., 39.38 per cent., 44.45 per cent., 32.05 per cent., 68.53 per cent., 4 per cent., 35.32 per cent.

Carpets of wool or cotton and mats of cotton reduced from 50 per cent. to 20 per cent.

In estimating the effect of these sharp reducti in this textile industry it must not be forgotten t the tariff rates of all recent bills were raised a "compensation" for the heavy duties on the r material of the manufacture, wool. Wool go upon the free list December 1, this "compensat rate" falls to the ground. The same might be s of other materials of manufacture, such as dy etc., upon which, large reductions being made. "compensatory" argument is automatically offs

The cotton schedule (I) has also received vig ous treatment downward, though not to the sa extent as Schedule K.

Cotton handkerchiefs, not hemmed, are redu from 59.27 per cent. to 25 per cent., a reduction 34.37 per cent.; ready-made clothing of cotton fr 50 per cent. to 30 per cent.; shirts, collars, and cu from 45 cents per dozen, plus 15 per cent., to 30 p cent., a reduction of 34.03 per cent.; cotton ta covers from 50 per cent. to 35 per cent.; cotton k stockings from 30 per cent. to 20 per cent.; cott stockings, part machine, part handmade, are much more, averaging a reduction of from 25 to per cent.; cotton gloves from 50 cents per doze plus 40 per cent., to 35 per cent., a reduction of 54.1 per cent.

Cotton garters, suspenders, bandings, etc., n embroidered, drop from 45 to 75 per cent., while sh and corset lacing fall from 25 cents per pound a 15 per cent. to 25 per cent., a decline of 28.96 p cent. Cotton labels fall 17.18 per cent., and cott belting for machinery from 30 to 15 per cent.

UNCLE SAM'S 29,499,136 CHILDREN

THE Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, of which Miss Julia C. Lathrop is chief, has just issued the first part of a handbook of Federal statistics of children, which shows the number of children in the country with their sex, age, race, nativity, parentage, and geographic distribution. The figures have been compiled from the reports of the 1910 census, and present in a small pamphlet facts regarding children which, in the census reports, are to be found only by searching through many long tables where the data for children are given in combination with those for adults. The figures are, of course, necessary as a basis in planning large-scale work for child welfare, and it is the hope of the bureau that the handbook will be a convenient book of reference for the growing number of persons actively engaged in such work. The future sections of the handbook will deal with more specific questions affecting children; the birth rate and infant mortality, literacy and school attendance, child labor, and the defective, dependent, and delinquent children. It is being compiled by Lewis Meriam, the assistant chief of the bureau, who was for seven years connected with the United States Census Bureau.

According to the figures in part one, on April 15, 1910, Uncle Sam had 29,499,136 children under fifteen years of age and they made up almost one-third of his entire family. Almost all these children were born on his own soil. The foreign-born white children numbered only 759,346 and formed only 2.6 per cent. of the total number of children. Child-welfare work is thus done in the main for children born in the United States.

Many of the native children are, of course, the children of immigrants. The figures show that in 1910 there were 7,225,569 native white children with one or both parents foreign-born. The native white with both parents native numbered 17,731,580 and formed 60.1 per cent. of all the children in the country. There were 3,665,107 negro children, forming 12.4 per cent. of the total number.

The negro children are found mainly in the Southern and Southwestern States, whereas the foreign-born whites are located principally in New England and in the Middle Atlantic and North Central States. The native whites of native parentage are, of course, more evenly distributed and a present in large numbers in all sections of t country.

The figures show the importance of givi thought to the welfare of the children in the smal cities and in rural communities. Social work children has been developed to a high degree many of our large cities, but the figures show tha less than one child in five is living in a city 100,000 inhabitants or over and that three childre in five are living in villages of less than 2,500 habitants or in distinctly rural communities. New England and in the Middle Atlantic, Nort Central, and Pacific States, the percentage of ch dren living in cities of 100,000 inhabitants or ove is far greater, reaching as high as 43.4 in t Middle Atlantic group. In the South Atlantic an South Central States, on the other hand, the pe centage living in cities of 100,000 or over is sma but the percentage in rural districts is high, bei above eighty in all the Southern divisions. T question of child welfare in the South is thus di tinctly a rural question, and even in the North a West a very considerable part of it is rural

We are to have some new missionaries with us for a time, so that we may teach them the language and initiate them into the ways of the land. They will then begin work among another tribe speaking the same language. It is very unusual in the sections of Africa where we labor that there should be several tribes speaking the same language; but it is an added blessing, as it greatly facilitates the work of their evangelization.

"Our work is interdenominational, and is a strictly faith mission. God is wonderfully supplying all our needs as we go forth, and making it possible for the Gospel to be preached in the heart of the continent, where lies 'the largest untouched mass of heathenism in the world.' Mohammedanism is coming in like a flood, and unless the land is soon occupied by missionaries of the Gospel the people are in danger of being carried away into the religion of the false prophet. At present these people are in the 'raw' state. Their religion consists of the offering of sacrifices of sheep or goats to the spirits, of which they live in continual fear. Together with this, in some tribes, there is sun worship. They gave the word 'asista' (the sun) for 'God,' and it was only after much labor that a satisfactory word was found for 'God.' They have a dim, vague idea of a Supreme Being, but he enters so little into their lives that they have almost forgotten even his name.

"We have had the joy of seeing a number of the heathen turning to Christ, and at this time in the work in the northeastern Belgian Congo there is great encouragement for our missionaries in seeing the large number abandoning their heathen customs and religion to become the followers of Jesus.

"We go with great gladness to our field of labor, and ask that you join us in praying the Lord of the harvest to send forth laborers into his harvest. The outgoing missionaries from this country are Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Hannay (whose pictures do not appear in the accompanying group as they have already gone to England and will join us there to complete the journey), Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Caldwell and baby son, Mr. Hugh H. Wallace, Mr. Harry P. Herdman, Miss Ruth E. Cable, Miss Margaret E. Bay, Mrs. Scouten, our little boy Arthur and myself."

THE CAMPERDOWN PEW

BY MARY E. Q. BRUSH

A Story Complete in This Issue

ISS MARIA CAMPERDOWN had gotten out of the habit of going to church. She had been brought up to attend regularly —dear me, yes!—being a deacon's daughou know. Unfortunately, about twelve months ous to the opening of our story, something had red which had offended Miss Maria, and the Sabbath she stayed away from divine worship aid grimly to herself, "I'll let them know how eased I am."

t, after all, most folks don't care so very much e is displeased; people are too busv to bother one's whims, and, although at first Miss Maabsence was made the subject of some com- , the matter was soon dropped. Other and important things took its place—the beauty durability of the new carpet, the election of rs for the Ladies' Aid—these, among others, the attention of the various church members, when the spinster realized this, she felt more nant than ever.

w, of course, by this time you are wondering the trouble was about.

was because of the recent renovation of the ch, mainly. Miss Maria did not exactly ape of this; she was rather averse to change any- and didn't consider that it was a wise and ssary thing, sometimes, to submit gracefully to nd that, moreover, if one puts love and self- l in with the money, it is a most commendable g to make beautiful the house of God.

be sure, Miss Maria didn't really object to ly tinted ceiling and a new carpet when these gs were suggested, but when it was proposed to hase new pews, she was quite indignant.

What! Remove the old ones? How dare they? Why, my father—he was deacon for over twenty-eight years—owned his pew; I have the deed."

"But, dear Miss Maria, it is intended to have free seats now—it seems much the better way. The fashion of individual ownership is done away with in most places. It is a thing of the past," said the secretary of the Ladies' Aid Society.

"Thing of the past, indeed!" And there was a flame of fire red on the spinster's high cheekbones. "I guess it isn't a thing of the past! Folks shan't take away my pew."

The secretary smiled indulgently.

"Oh, the consistory doesn't want the pews—these plain, worn, old pine things aren't of much value anyhow. The folks that own them can take them home, I dare say. The church will have, instead, comfortable, handsome, modern seats. You'll be sure to be pleased when you see them, Miss Maria."

"Me—humph!" the spinster sniffed, and the flame on her cheekbones was redder than ever.

One day she saw all the old pews out in the grassy churchyard. Some of them the sexton was splitting up for firewood; others were being taken away by their respective owners for the sake of sentiment.

Then it was that, with flashing eyes and lips tightly compressed, Miss Maria went in quest of a cartman in order that the old Camperdown pew might be respectfully conveyed to her own home. Now, to tell the truth, she hardly knew where to put it when it got there, for her house was crammed with old-fashioned furniture already, and, although the main living-room was quite large, when one considered the big lounge, the cherry secretary, the sewing-machine, the tall chest of drawers—well, really, there wasn't any place for that big, cumbersome pew. It was finally placed out in the yard under the Vicar of Wakefield pear tree.

The pew had already become quite weatherworn the October day on which Miss Maria is presented to the reader, and which found her, weary and a little breathless, seated on the shabby but revered bench. She had been engaged in gathering the Vicar of Wakefields, and a bushel basket, heaped high with the big, pale green, russet-cheeked fruit, stood at her feet.

As she sat there, resting in the mellow sunshine of the late autumn, she caught the whisper of boys' voices on the other side of the tall board fence dividing her yard from the highway. Fortunately, or unfortunately, Miss Maria's hearing was, despite her years, amazingly acute.

"Come, Ran, say you will," one of the boys was urging. "At nine o'clock sharp. The old lady will be abed by that time. We'll yank the old pew out of her yard and put it in the fountain in the park. She likes the pew, but she won't want the whole town talking about it like that. They all know what a row there was about it, and that's why she won't come to church any more. Then we'll have time to do some more stunts. Maybe we can paint Governor Winthrop's statue red. I'll be around for you about half-past eight. You're game, ain't you?"

"I would, Hal—but—you see I can't get out of looking after Rob. Mother's away. I promised."

"Oh, bring Rob along. It's time that kid stopped being a mollycoddle—and you, too."

TEMPTED AND TRIED

*A SERMON BY REV. DAVID J. BURRELL, D.D., LL.D.

TEXT: "Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience." James 1: 2-4

IN ONE of Paul's letters to the Christians at Corinth, he says, "There has no temptation taken you but such as is common to man." And the same might be written to the people of any modern community. Were there wine-shops along the streets of Corinth? So there are, in horrid multiplicity, along the streets of New York. Were there painted women leering at the open windows? So there are among us. Were there idol-meats for sale in the shambles? So there are now. Temptation is "common to man." Adam was tempted in Paradise; Abraham at Beersheba; Lot in Sodom; Moses in Midian; Daniel in Babylon; and Christ in the wilderness. There is no escaping it.

And temptation is as necessary as it is common to man. It is built into the constitution of the race. In the case of Adam it was necessary for the confirmation of character. He was created innocent; but innocency is not character. A graven image is free from sin. If Adam was to be a man he must be positively one thing or the other; either good or bad. To that end he must be tested; wherefore he was told not to eat of the fruit of the forbidden tree. A tree would answer as well as anything else; the point being that he must be put through some sort of ordeal to determine whether or no he would obey the behest of God. Unfortunately both for him and us he fell: and in falling he put himself and his children after him in the way of contracting the habit of sin.

The Necessity of Temptation

In the case of Christ—who is called "the second Adam" because he also stood as the representative man—temptation was necessary for a different reason. He had come into the world to be the knight-errant of the fallen race, that he might deliver men from the penalty and the power of sin. To this end he must enter into full fellowship with humanity, in order that he might become "an high priest able to be touched with the feeling of our infirmities." He was, therefore, "tempted in all points as we are." But, unlike the first Adam, he stood the test. He was "tempted in all points as we are, yet without sin."

In your case and mine temptation is necessary for the development of the graces that constitute character; wherefore it is written, "I will glory in tribulation; knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope; and hope maketh not ashamed." A ship swinging at anchor in the bay is of little or no use. Out yonder on the open seas there is danger; there are fogs and gales and hidden reefs; but what matters it? The ship must hoist anchor and venture forth, or she will take no part in the commerce of the world. So must a man meet the grapple of adverse forces if he would make his life tell. "The north wind makes vikings." A man of spirit will not shrink from taking heaven with the wind in his face.

It is a great thing, in point of fact, to be capable of trial. "How much better is a man than a sheep?" We are made in the likeness of God. And though we have fallen from our high estate, there are possibilities of goodness and greatness in us, which must somehow be brought out. And God our Father is profoundly interested in doing it.

Our Father's Leading

This brings us directly to the matter in hand. We want to know precisely what God's relation is to the temptations that beset us. And the Scriptures are very clear on this point.

First, we are advised that God does not tempt any man. It is written, "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man."

Second, It is equally clear from the teaching of Scripture that God leads us into temptation. The evangelists agree in saying that Jesus was "led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil." One of them puts it in even more emphatic form, saying, "The Spirit driveth him forth." And, for reasons already indicated, we are treated in the same way.

It must be understood that there is no sin in being tempted. A man may be compassed about by devils with no fault of his own. If Samson had been called down to Timnath on business it would have been no sin to pass Delilah on the street; but it was a different matter when he went to Timnath for the express purpose of meeting her, called at her house and laid his head in her lap. Luther says, "We cannot prevent the birds from flying over our heads, but we can prevent them from building their nests in our hair." So God does not lead us into sin when he leads us into temptation.

It is related that when the Black Prince had arrived at years of discretion his father, Edward III, deeming it necessary to wean him from the effeminate pleasures of the court, placed him in command of a troop at the battle of Crécy. In the heat of conflict a messenger came riding in hot haste to say that the prince was surrounded by the enemy. The king asked, "Is he wounded?" The answer was, "Nay, but in mighty peril." Then the king said, "Tell him that he hath this day an opportunity to win his spurs; and bid him not call upon me until he is in mortal extremity." For a like reason we are divinely led into temptation, that we may win our spurs; but our Father is ever near at hand and ready to help us.

Third, God could lead us around temptation, were he so disposed, and could wholly avert it. This is taught in the words of Jesus, "And when ye pray say, Our Father which art in heaven, lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

The question at once arises, If God leads us into temptation how can we pray, "Lead us not into it?" But, inasmuch as we are not acquainted with the divine plan concerning us, why should we not pray to be saved from the peril of temptation so far as this may be consistent with our good and the glory of God? Is it not a most natural thing to ask? Do we not pray in like manner to be delivered from pain and sickness and adversity? All such prayers, be it remembered, are offered in the filial spirit and only by such as can say "Our Father." By that token they are always acquiescent in the divine will.

"Deliver Us from Evil"

If we go to Gethsemane we shall find the only-begotten Son making just such a prayer. When the purple cup of death was pressed to his lips every nerve and sinew quivered and shrank from it. "O my Father," he cried, "if it be possible, let this cup pass from me!" And sweating as it were great drops of blood he cried again, "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me!" That cup was filled with the death that was due to us. He as our substitute must drink it or else we ourselves must drink it. Wherefore he cried again, "O my Father, if it be not possible, thy will be done!" In a like filial spirit we pray, "Lead us not into temptation." But observe, the prayer does not end that way: let us have the whole of it: "Lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil." It is precisely as if we said, "O Father, if it be possible, save us from the bitter hour of trial; but in any case, save us from sin!"

It is recorded that Jesus said to Peter, in anticipation of his approaching hour of temptation in the judgment hall, "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." Matt. 26: 41. And again, with the same trial in view, he said to Peter, "Satan hath desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat; but I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not." It thus appears that while Peter was advised to pray that he might not enter into temptation, the prayer of the far-seeing Christ was that in the hour of temptation the faith of Peter might not fail. The result makes it appear that Peter was tried and did temporarily fall, in denying his Lord; but also that he learned his lesson and was thereby enabled to "strengthen the brethren," and that his faith failed not.

Fourth, we are advised that in the hour of temptation we may be divinely sustained if we will have it so. Thus it is written, "God is faithful, w not suffer you to be tempted above that ye a but will with the temptation make a way to that ye may be able to bear it." I Cor. 10: 1

The stress of temptation is never beyo strength. "God tempers the wind to the lamb." His promise is, "As thy days, so sh strength be." I have no sympathy with a dr who says, "I can't help it." He can; he doesn't want to. No doubt a man can by h indulgence so vitiate and enfeeble his will th a frightfully hard thing to resist the intox cup; but there is nobody but himself to bla that. And even in this case, there is a definit in divine help if he chooses to accept it. Th of hell cannot prevail against a man who i tressed by the power of God.

In all the universe there is no force tha compel a man to sin. The most that Satan cou to Christ in the wilderness was, "Cast down." He could not cast him down, nor co oblige Christ to do it. Every sin is volunta the nature of the case. No man is responsib what he cannot avoid; but no full-grown man to be willing to plead the baby act. "The fault Brutus, is not in our stars, but in ourselves are underlings." We have infinite resources command in the promise of divine help; whe "Be strong! Quit you like men!"

The Fourth Man in the Fire

The old story of the Babylonish youths i furnace is full of suggestion. Dan. 3. For ref to bow down before the golden image they summoned before the king, who gave them the c of idolatry or death. Their answer was, "W not careful, O king, to answer thee in this m Our God whom we serve is able to deliver us the fiery furnace; and he will deliver us. But i be it known unto thee that we will not worshi golden image which thou hast set up!" That enough; they were bound and cast into the fur The king looked in and was astonished. He sa his counselors, "Did we not cast three men b into the midst of the fire?" They answered, "T O king." He said, "Behold, I see four men wal in the midst of the fire and they have no hurt! the fourth is like unto the Son of God." Here i defense in temptation; the fourth Man in the God is faithful, who has said, "I will deliver th six troubles; yea, in seven there shall no evil t thee."

Fifth, we triumph over temptation when we allow God to help us. "Blessed is the man that dureth temptation; for when he is tried he s receive the crown of life which the Lord hath pr ised to them that love him." James 1: 12.

Of all the joys that are possible to mortal there is none to be compared with that which experience in triumphing over a besetting sin. did the young stripling rejoice when he brought gory head of Goliath up to the king's tent, say "I have overcome in the name of the God of Isra

It is recorded that when the temptation of Je in the wilderness was over "angels came and m istered unto him." In the struggle of life we "compassed about with a great cloud of witness All heaven is interested in seeing us get the bet of our sins.

The Strength of Victory

And every such victory adds to our strength character. The Moslems say that the man slays his enemy in battle absorbs the strength his vanquished foe. There is a truth here every earnest soul in the grapple with sin. Gr are the promises to him who triumphs. "To h that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of l which is in the midst of the Paradise of God." that overcometh shall not be hurt of the sec death." "To him that overcometh will I give t morning star." "He that overcometh shall clothed in white raiment; and I will confess h name before my Father and the angels." "H that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temp

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, October 19. Deuteronomy 1: 22-36. "The Lord your God which goeth before you, he shall fight for you." The Lord as our pioneer, preparing the way! The faithful man never has to break new ground; the Lord broke it before him. Our apparent discoveries ve all been discovered before us. When we come upon a new experience d has already written his name upon it. When we find a sparkling ing in our way God has already taken its measure. When we come to ne difficult hill, which we have never seen before, and which fills us with r, the Lord has already created springs at its base, and arbors of rest on the wearying slope. Circumstances may surprise us; they never prise God.

"He shall fight for you." We are not going alone into battle. God is on field before the fight begins. The great Ally is in the van, and the foes the saints have to contend with him. Why, then, these fears? And erefore our retreats? "God is with us! God is with us!" He is the ader of the battle as well as of the campaign. Let us take our orders m him. Let us go into the unknown day in the glorious assurance of umph.

Who shall dream of shrinking,
By our Captain led?

MONDAY, October 20. Numbers 20: 1-13. Water out of the rock! Thus does the Lord turn the wilderness into "a place of springs." He makes the impossible place the home of the fountain. The Lord can make the driest experience yield spiritual refreshment. e can make the appalling realm of dry sorrow disclose wells of consolaon. He can make even the grim abode of bereavement to reveal "a well, ringing up into everlasting life." We never know what God is hiding hind his rocks; we can never guess what "hidden manna" is stored up in e wilderness. "The Lord will provide."

When, therefore, the Lord leads us into dry places, where huge rocks are reared, and the barren wilderness stretches on every side, let us not fill e air with our complaints. The wilderness is God's garden, and he can ake it musical with streams. The rocks are his storehouses, in which hides his bounty. Let us "rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him." ven in the wilderness "all things are ready." At the appointed time I all behold his table laden with the bounties of his grace.

TUESDAY, October 21. Isaiah 48: 16-22. "They thirsted not when he led them through the deserts." God's presence transforms the desert. His companionship makes Eden everywhere. Where God is there is the best of everything. The desert without God would be ell; but with God the desert is heaven. When two souls are in the sweet mmunion of early love what matters it where they dwell, whether in me grim manufacturing town or in some lovely rural retreat? Their mmunion converts dingy streets into lanes of Arcadia, and the grayest rroundings appear clothed in silver and gold. A fellowship can transgure a place; love, the magician, irradiates a shepherd's hut.

And what matters it if the great Lover of my soul lead me into the esert? His presence is the very home of grace and graces. And if the heart that inspires all loveliness is with me in the desert place, he will now how to convey to me his grace even in scenes of desolation. "I will rust and not be afraid." I will love, and perfect love shall cast out fear. shall thirst not, even though he lead me through the desert.

WEDNESDAY, October 22. Exodus 15: 22-27. The living tree made the bitter waters sweet. And I know other waters, more bitter than the bitterest springs—the waters of poisoned emotion. Pools of bitterness hide in many a heart; envy, jealousy, malice, nd all uncharitableness. These hidden pools send their bitter influence nto everything—into our thought, into our motives, into our judgments, nto our words and our deeds. They infect all the issues of the life, and ob it of all its sweetness. No more awful thing can be said of anybody han this: "He has become very bitter!" "She has turned very bitter!" t means that all life's cordials have been soured, that some antagonism as befouled all "the genial currents of the soul."

But if I know these bitter pools, I also know a living tree that can make hem sweet. It is the Tree of Life whose leaves are for the healing of the nations. Life which has become soured needs to be renewed, and it can only be renewed by vital communion with the living God. The Lord can touch the bitter pool and make it sweet. He can destroy every defiling element that spoils our souls, and he can make "the waters in my breast" to be pure and sweet and wholesome as the crystal sea.

THURSDAY, October 23. John 4: 5-14. "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well." Then I shall not need to fetch my water from anywhere; I shall carry the well about with me. There will be no necessity to fetch it from a priest, or to seek it in any particular institution. The Lord will unseal the spring in my own soul, and all my dealings are with him.

I knew a farmer who had to carry all his water from a pump across the village-green. The toil of it, and the weariness of it! And one day he sank a deep shaft in his own farmyard and found an endless supply of living water. He found his spring just where he needed it, and the burdensome comings and goings were ended.

And the good Lord is waiting to open out our satisfactions within the privacy of our own souls. We rush here and there for our refreshment. We take long journeys to find rest. We turn to many books for comfort and we travel far and wide for our fountains of delight. And yet we fail, and we are thirsty still. We need the well within and the Lord is willing to give it. Yes, it is "the water that I shall give"! The willingness to have it is the condition of receiving it. "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters!"

FRIDAY, October 24. Psalm 106: 23-33. "Had not Moses His chosen stood before him in the breach." One man's loyalty often stands between a disloyal man and his destruction. We can never estimate our indebtedness. We never know who is defending us from the just penalties of our own misdeeds. "Had not the mother, His chosen, stood before him," how would it have fared with many of the children? The prayers of many a glorious father are gathered as a stout defense against his silly and rebellious sons. "I will not do it for David thy father's sake." We are shielded by vicarious strength. Another man's goodness is sheltering us from destruction.

When we are counting our mercies let us remember our anonymous benefactors whose loyalty flings shields about our souls. One of the great surprises in the world to come will surely be the discovery how strangely interrelated our lives have been in the present world. We are influencing one another every moment, either in helpfulness or in hindrance, either in impoverishing our defenses or in strengthening them. Thank God for all the good men and women whose goodness is our shield, and whose loyalty so often stands between us and our deserts.

SATURDAY, October 25. Numbers 20: 22-29. We cannot let the fire fall out of the fire-grate into the room without something being scorched or consumed. Fire out of bounds means destruction. And when the soul breaks away from the restraining commandments of God some treasure is assuredly destroyed. Rebellion is certain impoverishment. It may look like liberty and expansion; in reality it is restriction and suicide. Rebellion in the wilderness prolonged the wilderness. The promised land was farther away. To rebel seemed like an assertion of freedom; it was the assumption of a more galling bondage.

To sin is always a losing game. By no possibility can a rebel against God keep his throne. It is a flash in a pan, followed by a deeper gloom. Sin is certain loss. Every time we sin we lose part of our inheritance. Some perception is impaired. Some spiritual faculty is bruised. The garment of character is rent and defiled. We can no more scatter glowing coals about our room with impunity than fill our souls with sin and expect no destruction. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," and the death begins with the sin.

TEMPTED AND TRIED

y God." "To him that overcometh will I grant t with me in my throne, even as I also over- and am set down with my Father in his ne." "To him that overcometh will I give to of the hidden manna; and I will give him a e stone, and in the stone a new name written h no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it." essed overcoming! O glorious crown of life! may be that some one now reading these words cing a fierce temptation. How shall he meet By self-dependence? Shall the oft-taught les- of experience go for naught? "Is any tempted, im pray." There is "a way of escape," but it ot the path of self-reliance. Resolutions fail n there is no strong staff to lean on. Prayer e secret passage to the light. Try prayer, my nd; and see Christ coming to your aid! Lean hard on him. He has been through temptation and "can be touched with a feeling of our infirmities." His arm is an almighty arm. He never failed a man yet. He not only pardons but saves from the power of sin. He enables us to say, "I know whom I have believed and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day."

The shining seats of heaven are full of sinners who have passed through the hard grapple with temptation and are "more than conquerors" by the grace of God. Listen to this: "I beheld, and lo, a great multitude which no man could number stood before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes and with palms in their hands. And they cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God! And one of the elders said unto me, Who are these which are arrayed in white robes, and whence came they? I said unto him, Sir, thou knowest. And he said, These are they which came out of great tribulation—out of the harrowing of trial—and they have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God."

Oh for the white robes and the palm of victory! Blessed is the man that endureth temptation! The possibilities of character and life and the unfading crown are in it. God help us to endure and to come off victorious, that we, too, may wave a palm branch before the throne of God!

Reformer Becomes a Convict

ON SEPTEMBER 29 Thomas Mott Osborne, chairman of the New York State Committee for Prison Reform, entered Auburn Prison to serve a self-imposed sentence as a convict. In addressing the prisoners on the day before he became their voluntary companion, Mr. Osborne said in part: "As chairman of the Committee on Prison Reform, the superintendent of prisons and Warden Rattigan have kindly given me permission to carry out a plan to determine the psychological effect of the present prison system upon the prisoners. I want to find out whether our prison system is unintelligent; whether it flies in the face of all common sense and human nature, as I think it does, and whether, guided by sympathy and experience, we cannot find something far better to take its place, as I believe we can. I am coming here to learn what I can at first hand. In the court of conscience I have been found guilty of having lived many years indifferent to and ignorant of what has been going on behind these walls, and I have been sentenced to a short term at hard labor in Auburn Prison. I expect to be in, serving my sentence, this week; to live your life; to be housed, clothed, fed, treated in all respects like one of you. I want to see for myself exactly what your life is like; not as viewed from the outside in, but from the inside out. A word to the officials: My plan will not altogether succeed unless I am treated exactly like these other men. I ask you, therefore, to aid me by making no discrimination in my favor. Relax your regular discipline not a jot while I am here. Give me the same guidance as these others—no more. If I offend against the rules, give me the same punishment. I shall expect it. I have the feeling that after I have really lived among you, marched in your lines, shared your food, gone to the same stone cells at night, and in the morning looked out at God's sunlight through those same iron bars—that then, and not until then, can I feel the knowledge which will break down the barriers between my soul and the souls of my brothers." Within two days, Mr. Osborne, or Tom Brown as he is called in the prison, was twice reprimanded by the keepers for infractions of minor rules. He is living the regular life of the prisoners, working as they work. All communication with the world outside the walls has been absolutely cut.

Ten Dead, Twenty Hurt in Shooting

HARRISTON, Miss., was the scene of a reign of murder on the morning of September 28. Two young negroes, brothers, one of whom was crazed with cocaine, it is stated, started the trouble which developed into what was practically a race riot, and which ended only after three white men, four negroes and a negro woman had been shot and a score of persons wounded. The trouble began about two o'clock in the morning and continued till ten o'clock, when the negro who started the shooting was caught and lynched. His brother, who had joined him, was shot by a party of citizens.

A negro named Jones shot and killed a negro woman, then went to his home and roused his brother. Together the two started out to shoot up the town. They called an ex-constable out upon his front doorstep and shot him dead. They wounded his son, then rushed on to the railway station, where they wounded several and killed one. Such was their career through the main street of the town. The sheriff of the county was killed while leading a posse to capture the outlaws. Fearing that strong race feeling might lead to further trouble a company of National Guardsmen was rushed in from Natchez.

First Boat in Panama Locks

STEADY progress is being made toward the completion of the Panama Canal. On September 26 the first boat was raised in the Gatun Locks and floated into Gatun Lake. Three thousand persons witnessed this historic event. A tug bearing a party of canal officials and their families was lifted through the lock that afternoon from the Atlantic side and passed back again on the following morning. The operations were conducted with great care, and everything went through according to schedule. The three chambers, upper, middle, and lower, on the west side of the locks were used on this occasion. The men worked far into the previous night, making everything ready for the operation. The upper lock filled in the forenoon, and that afternoon the water was admitted to the middle and lower locks, but it was not until 4.45 P.M. that the water to the lower lock had reached the level of that in the sea channel outside. Then the sea gate was swung, and a moment later the tug, which had been in readiness all day in the approach channel, turned its head toward the entrance. As the vessel passed inside the lower lock chamber a mighty cheer went up from the assembled thousands that lined the lock walls, the tug's whistle was blown loud and long, and all the whistles in the neighborhood joined in the chorus.

More War in Macedonia

THE menacing language of the Constantinople newspapers that represent the Turkish military element confirms the uncompromising attitude adopted by Turkey in her demands upon Greece. It has been declared that if Greece fails to yield "she is doomed to be driven from Salonica and Epirus within the limits of her old frontier," and that "Greece is bound to yield on the question of the islands in the Ægean Sea before the united Bulgarian and Turkish armies."

King Constantine, who was enjoying a vacation at Eastbourne, a seaside resort on the south coast of England, left hastily for Athens. There is no doubt that the Hellenic Government considers the situation very serious. All Greek officers have been recalled for active service with their commands and many of the regiments disbanded after the conclusion of the campaign against Turkey are now being remobilized. The activities of the Turkish troops are believed by the Greeks to foreshadow an attempt by them to recapture the port of Kavala, on the Ægean Sea, which cost Greece so much in blood and treasure to wrest from the hands of the Bulgarians in the fighting which broke out between the two former allies after the cessation of hostilities against Turkey.

Turkish officers on their way from Asia Minor to the Province of Thrace openly admit that Kavala is the objective of Ottoman aspirations. It is said that the Powers will veto any attempt of the Turks to seize Kavala, but the futility of the treaty of London to make Adrianople Bulgarian has [illegible] mated the military party of the Young Turks with any great amount o for the decision of the European concert. Turkey now is in the hand all-powerful military party, which is liable to take any action wh strengthen it with the people.

New Federal Ownership Plan

THE following important statements formed part of special despatch from Washington to the New Yorl early in October: "Notwithstanding efforts at profound it has become known here that the Wilson administr engaged in preparing the groundwork for legislation looking toward ment ownership of the telegraph lines of the country. The policy, it is intended to be even more far-reaching in its effect and to include ownership of interstate telephone properties. Indeed, the telephone lir be used as the means of bringing about Federal ownership of all tl systems of the country, if the policy ever is carried into effect. Just h when the seed was sown of this new phase of the old agitation for l ownership and control of wire communications has not been disclosed.

"The expense involved in the purchase of privately owned telegrap would be staggering. But a means out of the monetary embarrassment to have been suggested to those who favor government ownership by t that the government, through the extension of the parcel post systen acquire the express business of the country through furnishing comp which the private companies will not be able to meet. If the governn able to get all the express business on taking off the weight limit of the post and making rates with which the express companies cannot compet should not the government get control of wire communications by ac and utilizing long-distance telephone lines to compete with the telegrap panies? That question puts in a nutshell the problem that is now considered in administration circles."

Earthquake Shocks at Panama

TWO severe earthquake shocks were felt at Panama night of October 1. The first occurred at 10.20 P.M the second an hour later. The second disturbance was th severe, lasting forty seconds. Telephone connections damaged, and some older buildings were strained and show some effects shock. As far as can be learned at the date of going to press, no damag done to any of the canal buildings or locks. In Panama City, where the came in a tremulous upheaving motion, the people were panic-stricke rushed into the streets in throngs. From Colon a despatch tells of a di ance at 11.40 P.M. It began with a slow oscillatory movement, which gra became more marked. Houses swayed, clocks stopped, and articles of fur were thrown to the floor. Many of the residents became half panic-st and rushed from their homes. No earthquake shock of importance has occ on the Isthmus in 150 years. The report of the Special Board of Eng who visited the Canal Zone with President Taft in 1909 laid stress upo ability of the canal construction to withstand shocks. Only a few hours b the earthquakes took place water was let into Culebra Cut from Gatun through four twenty-four-inch pipes under Gamboa Dike. This marke completion of the work begun by the French on January 20, 1882, when the labor of excavating the cut section of the canal was started.

Mexican Revolutionists Lose Ground

THE anniversary of Mexico's achievement of constitut government this year witnesses the rather peculiar spe of several thousand revolutionists in arms against the Fe authorities gathered in Matamoras to celebrate their coun freedom. The accompanying photograph of three of the most prom leaders was taken on that day. General Lucio Blanco is in command the Constitutionalist forces in the States of Nuevo Leon and Tamaulipas. The most recent reports indicate that the Huerta forces have succeeded in cutting communication between General Blanco's army and the insurgents in Coahuila, the rebel stronghold. During the last week of September the Federals under General Maas moved northward and captured the towns of Sabinas and Barroteran. This force moved along the line of the destroyed Mexican National Railway between this place and Monterey, gradually forcing the Constitutionalists back under heavy artillery fire. At Barroteran the insurgents endeavored to make a stand, but General Pablo Gonzales decided it would be useless to risk his men until they should be reinforced. All property which might have been used by the Federals, much of it owned by foreigners, was dynamited or burned. Muzquiz was abandoned by the Constitutionalists, and several Federal prisoners were put to death when it was learned that the Huerta forces occupied Barroteran. Americans who were ordered to leave the distur district have arrived from the front, and assert that the great mining pr erties at Menor, Aguajita, Rosita, and possibly Esperanza, as well as the to of Barroteran, were destroyed to prevent their capture by the Federals. least 3,000 refugees from the battle zone are reported fleeing toward Pied Negras, with the intention of crossing the border into Texas.

REGULATING THE "MOVIES"

BY KATE DAVIS

JUDGE BEN B. LINDSEY

THE crimes and misdemeanors of children today go hand in hand with the suggestion and training of the moving picture. This is no conjecture. Innumerable varieties of crime committed by children have been directly traced by the courts to this modern school, and it was these findings that resulted in the organizing of the National Legal Regulation League. This body is composed of the representative men and women pledged to carry educational campaigns for the purpose of eliminating the crime-creative films by means of municipal ordinances and State legislation. Vice-President Thomas R. Marshall, Cardinal Gibbons, Bishops Quayle and Hoban, Henry Watterson, Dr. Floyd Tomkins, B. S. Steadwell, president of the World's Purity Federation; Arthur Burrage Farwell, president of the Chicago Law Order Society; Captain Owen O. Wiard; Mrs. Kate Waller Barrett, president National Council of Women; la McDowell, founder of Chicago University Settlement; Ella Flagg Young n many other prominent workers are members of the advisory board. Judge e B. Lindsey of Denver is chairman of the judicial committee. The com- i e is composed of judges representing a large majority of the States.

e much-needed reform of the picture films has been inaugurated in all the t s. Scores of cities have come under municipal regulation and the shows n o States are regulated by State legislation. Bills for the regulation of n g picture shows were before the legislatures of a dozen States during he ast session.

r juvenile and police courts are crowded with boys who have committed nc trous and unbelievable crimes: murder, arson, burglaries, hold-ups, street h ing, etc. We have gangs of burglars, composed of any number of boys r four to twenty-five. Boys aged from eight to eighteen years have organze hemselves for criminal purposes. One judge says that between 65 and 70 pe ent. of the criminals going through the court at the present time are mere bo all younger than twenty-five years old.

is an easy matter to determine why the members of the National Legal Re lation League organization have been so painfully affected by the infor- n on gathered. The attitude of the boys is the most hopeless phase of the vi e matter. They are invariably indifferent, insensible to the gravity of h position. They feel no moral degradation. They want to be set free th they may resort to shallow tricks, trading on the grief of their mothers or t r members of their families. One day on the bench, as the procession of c moves along, would appal any citizen. If a boy can be induced to discuss h natter, he invariably declares he doesn't know why he committed the crime.

is country and every other country invaded by the motion picture show a s one of the gravest problems that has ever been dealt with by any nation. u e Ben B. Lindsey found a gang of girl burglars in Denver this year. They v e Sunday school girls, born in respectable families, aged eight, ten and v ve. They told Judge Lindsey that when they did not know how to commit me they went to the "movies" and studied the films until they got the idea. ipped with this knowledge, success attended their efforts. When they e captured they were trying to pass twenty dollar bills for candy.

rime is increasing two and a half times faster among children than among ts, and the juvenile court judges of this country agree that the crime- tive film is largely responsible for this condition. Juvenile Court Judge ms of Cleveland says that sixty thousand citizens of that city visit the vs daily, and a large majority of the films exhibited are unfit to be seen.

udge Steven Graham of Port Huron says: "All delinquents brought before are frequenters of motion picture shows."

udge Henry A. Fuller of Wilkes-Barre declares that the motion picture is not legally regulated will do more harm than all the saloons.

udge Williams of Baltimore had to decide what to do with a boy who had cked a railroad train after having seen a train-wrecking on the films.

udge Taylor of Indianapolis holds the "movies" responsible for a large ority of the crimes committed by children in that city.

Judge Collins of the same city has denounced the cheap theater as the cause of the cases of domestic infidelity that crowd the police courts. The dark motion-picture theater has been almost universally condemned, and it is an aim of the national organization to make these places light, sanitary, properly protected against fire; to eliminate the vicious film, the vulgar story and the suggestive song. When this is done the motion-picture theater will be the estimable rival of the street corner, the saloon, the poolroom and the dance hall.

A Campaign Outline for the National Council of Women and one of its constituent bodies, The National Woman's Temperance Union follows in response to a request of Flo Jameson Miller, the secretary of that organization. The same course can be pursued by any organization or church that may be inclined to take up this important matter.

MISS KATE DAVIS

A committee of experienced workers must be appointed for the purpose of making investigations. The committee for the village or town can be small; a city needs a large committee. "Citizens' Committee" is a good name for the workers to adopt; it seems to clothe them with authority. A list of the shows of the city is made and each member takes an equal number of places to visit. The work to be done is not advertised. Each committee member is equipped with a form to be filled out. This makes it possible for one who is unfamiliar with the work to make a valuable, intelligent report.

(1) Name of theater and address. (2) Nature of show, motion pictures or pictures and vaudeville. (3-a) Moral tone, recreative and educational, neutral, demoralizing. (3-b) Vaudeville, innocently entertaining, obscene, vulgar. (4) Ventilation. (5) Safety as to exits, booth precautions. (6) Lighting in showhouses. (7) Seating capacity. (8) Sanitation and cleanliness. (9) Attendance. Afternoon. Men, women, boys and girls under sixteen. (10) General deportment of audience. (11) Evening, same report on attendance and deportment.

A meeting is called for the report. After the report has been considered a discussion on conditions will follow. It is not wise to admit a reporter nor to invite the exhibitors to this first meeting. It arouses unnecessary antagonism to have an exaggerated report go out from this first meeting. Neither is it wise to meet the exhibitors before the committee is equipped with full knowledge of the situation. The workers must definitely approve and definitely condemn, must know just the changes needed to better conditions.

Some member of the committee can take the reports and write a general report of the survey for the newspapers. If the report is wholly good, the committee will warmly commend the exhibitors for the interest shown in the moral tone of the shows. If the places need attention a general report of conditions is made, but no theaters must be mentioned. The organization can then request the exhibitors to meet with them.

The situation is gone over carefully with the exhibitors, giving conditions in definite places, and the exhibitors are requested to make the necessary reforms. They are pretty certain to be reasonable. Two years ago exhibitors largely resented interference. A progressive among them came over with the reformers. He so increased his patronage and his profits that the men are beginning to recognize the value of co-operation with the thinking public. The exhibitors will pledge co-operation and the optimists will believe the matter will be easily adjusted. But it is necessary for the public to be constantly on the alert.

Persistent efforts by the committee will probably bring results and put the city under municipal regulations. If this cannot be done quietly it can be done by a publicity campaign. The ministers of any of the churches will preach sermons, and resolutions can be passed by congregations urging city ordinances that will make these show houses safe and sane places for our children.

The municipal regulation of cities is a part of the educational work. When a majority of the cities in any State pass ordinances that place a restriction upon the theaters, the exhibitors will immediately work for and welcome a uniform regulation by State legislation. Co-operation with exhibitors is warmly advocated when and where it is possible.

WHAT AMERICA HAS DONE FOR THE PHILIPPINES

N MY first glance shoreward as the Manchuria neared the breakwater off Manila, I got an object lesson—a concrete example of the sort of thing that had been accomplished here in a physical way by American initiative and enterprise and through American good government. Rising in the dis- ce above a plain was the low, gray wall of the Manila of the Spaniards, lt 350 years ago. Its moss-covered side not only marked the sea front of town, but the limit of progress of the country toward civilization after ee and a half centuries of Spanish rule.

'he breakwater that gave Manila a harbor, a fine piece of engineering l construction work that would compare favorably with that of Dover, at ich so many Channel-crossing Americans have gazed with envious admira- n, was put there by Americans. But this was not what made the whole eal. Back of a fine permanent sea wall, which stretched as far to right and left as the eye could take in, was a big area of land that had simply been oped as mud from the bottom of the bay and dumped there to such a breadth t the old Spanish wall was left far inland. Here was enough ground to sup- t a new city, absolutely "created" out of the water, with modern docks, and ring huge concrete structures that would do credit to our richest city, and ndreds of years in advance of that old Spanish wall.

n going about the city I saw an American trolley line doing a tremendous siness, and helping in the development of suburban real estate. American policemen were standing at congested corners calmly regulating traffic. I saw schools and hospitals, run along the most modern American lines; a model prison that has accomplished results that might amaze the governors of our penal institutions at home. During my travels in Luzon and the other islands, I have seen miles and miles of good roads that would put the supervisors of thoroughfares in the States of New York and Connecticut to shame. The road from Manila to Lucena, which only four years ago was in parts a morass, would delight any automobilist who had ever tried to steer clear of the ruts along the Boston post road between New York and Stamford, Conn. I have seen great modern American lumber and sugar mills converting Philippine products into world necessities, and employing thousands at wages they never could hope to get before. I have seen beautiful government buildings in provincial capitals. I have seen "taos" who look as if they had just climbed down from the cocoanut trees and left their tails behind them being taught not only to work, but how to live. Every American industrial plant in the islands is a school of hygiene, and the details of the instruction some of these people have to receive as to habits of personal cleanliness would upset a delicate stomach. A further enumeration would prove wearisome; but, in short, I have seen modern enlightenment coming out a winner after fifteen years of grappling with the savagery of thousands of years, and the fictitious civilization grafted upon its back by the Spaniards.—Albert S. Crockett in the Independent.

Missionary Dangers in China

IN THE storm that is now sweeping across China, incident to the struggle for reconstruction, there is peril to foreigners and especially to the missionaries who are stationed at remote points in the interior. A painful illustration of the dangers in the present situation is seen in the case of the eight missionaries at Tsaoyang in Hupeh province, who have been seized by a band of outlaws and held for ransom. A rescuing party is on the way, but there are slight hopes of its success. Our legation at Peking is exerting itself in behalf of the captives, several of whom are Americans.

China is a land of Christian martyrs. The history of the early Protestant missions is marked by many noble sacrifices for the Gospel. For forty years the empire has been a storm center, with occasional intervals of peace, and there is scarcely a province which cannot tell its story of martyrdom. During the Boxer troubles (1899-1900), the martyr roll of the Protestant missions was swelled by the addition of many devoted workers. Fifty-eight men and 77 women, all missionaries, with 52 children, perished in that fateful year, 32 of them Americans. Among the native Christians, it is estimated that 16,000 gave up their lives for Christ, when they might have escaped had they recanted and denied the Lord.

The friends of missions throughout the world are earnestly praying that a way may be providentially opened for the escape of the captives in Hupeh.

The Call of the Cross

IT USED to mean something to be a Christian. That is, it used to cost something. England is justly indignant over Bernard Shaw's new play in which he makes the sufferings of the early Christian martyrs the theme of a cheap, clownish exhibition. Mr. Shaw ought to know better than that. Whatever faults the church may have had, it has meant so much to civilization, and the sufferings of many of its adherents have been so real and so heroic, that it is difficult to imagine the kind of soul a man must have who would ridicule those ancient sorrows and the sacrifices of its later saints.

But in our present-day American church life it is sometimes difficult to find much of this quality of real self-sacrifice. What are American Christians giving up or suffering for Jesus' sake? What are we doing for him that is really difficult? It cannot be that all the hard work has been done and that the time has come for taking our ease, for the amount of work in plain sight remaining to be done is truly staggering. Professor James, shortly before his death, wrote a remarkable treatise on work as A Substitute for War. He held that the brave and faithful doing of one's work would develop all those qualities of stern courage which war has been supposed to foster and strengthen. So, though there is no chance for martyrdom now, there is a chance for a kind and an amount of work and sacrifice that will do for the modern church what martyrdom did for the ancient.

I gave my life for thee. What hast thou given for me?

This is still the sad and earnest question that Jesus is asking every follower of his. We are not doing and giving enough till we are giving and doing all we can. That was the measure of his sacrifice for us, and that is the measure needed to meet the world's great need.

We cannot carry money or lands into the next life. But we can lay up treasure now that will be waiting for us there, by kindness and services to others in the name of Christ, and by winning them to his salvation. He wants us to be happy, but he wants us to be happy in his love and service, not in the mad ways of the world. His challenge has not changed. It sounds above the foolish laughter, the empty music, the selfish strivings of a thoughtless, pleasure-loving age: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me."

The President and the Market Basket

IT IS announced from Washington that the administration is busy with the preliminary steps looking to a nation-wide inquiry to ascertain the causes and devise the remedy for the present high cost of living. President Wilson, mindful of the fact that the administration stands pledged to do all that lies in its power to solve this weighty problem, is personally taking an active part in directing the investigation. At the outset, the endeavor is to gather reliable information as to the best means of increasing stock and general agricultural production. This accomplished, ways and means of reducing the cost of farm products to the great mass of consumers will be thoroughly canvassed. This involves the question of agricultural and community organization for the purpose of providing better marketing facilities. Incidentally, the whole subject of farm finances will be taken up thoroughly, and a new system of farm credits may be planned. Some thirty thousand crop correspondents of the Agricultural Bureau and several thousand county correspondents are engaged in seeking direct from the farmers the information upon which the investigators will proceed with the work. Railroads, boat lines and other transportation companies will contribute to the general fund of information. A congressional committee will visit agricultural centers in different States in search of enlightenment. Any effort in this direction will have the heartiest support of the people. Meanwhile, the prices of food commodities continue to soar and the burden pressing on the average American householder grows steadily heavier.

The Gospel of "Sittlichkeit"

IN HIS recent address before the American Bar Association in Montreal, the Lord High Chancellor of England, Viscount Haldane, made use of an expression which seems destined to be permanently recognized and adopted into the language of international diplomacy. He declared that the invisible force which influenced civilized peoples and governments to observe the law, not only in the letter but in the spirit and purpose, in their dealings with each other, was not the moral power of the law, nor a dread of the penalties its violation involved, but a higher and nobler spirit of obedience, which had regard to the justice due to others and the self-respect we owe to ourselves. To this higher law of the national conscience and the spirit of the community, the Germans give the expressive name Sittlichkeit, a term which has no precise equivalent in the English language. Perhaps the nearest approach to a literal rendering of it would be "high moral feeling."

The Lord Chancellor, speaking of it in operation, said it represented those ethical principles which regulated civilized society in the individual relations of its members toward each other, as well as among communities in their mutual good-will and general attitude and actions. It should not be confounded with the clamor of a mob, which he denomi[nated] "mere aggregate of voices," and to which [it was] infinitely superior. He believed it possible [to de]velop an international Sittlichkeit, especially [among] countries already on friendly terms, and it [his no]vation would make for peace, for the [suppres]tion of social impurities, and the betterment [of hu]man society generally. Few will fail to re[cognize] in this description qualities in the new dip[lomacy] that are akin to the teachings of the old Gos[pel]; the diffusion of the new idea will be produc[tive of] higher honor among nations, a friendlier sp[irit be]tween different countries and peoples, and a c[ondi]sweeter, nobler state of society generally, it [will] come too soon.

"The Fundamentals"

THIS is the title of a wonderful set of te[n] volumes, pocket-size, which have been pu[blished] through the liberality of two wealthy Ch[ristian] laymen in Chicago for circulation among [pas]tors and teachers. These ten volumes have [been] characterized as the "ablest, wisest, cleare[st] most convincing exposition of the foundation [truths] of the Christian faith that has yet been pre[sented] by consecrated modern scholarship, in a styl[e] form which all who read can understand." The editors of this paper have been deeply imp[ressed] with the value of The Fundamentals, and afte[r] consideration decided to make an effort to sec[ure a] special edition of the books for circulation a[mong] the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Th[e ar]rangement has just been completed satisfact[orily], and we are now enabled to promise our rea[ders], new and old, the privilege of securing sets of [the] ten little volumes practically free. The forma[l an]nouncement of this offer will appear in our [next] issue.

We take pleasure in commending The Fu[nda]mentals to every one who desires to be [well] informed on all questions of vital moment de[aling] with the Christian religion. They are a theolo[gical] library in petto—a treasury of enlightenmen[t for] every one who loves the Bible and who desir[es to] be informed on all the questions that affect [the] Christian religion at the present time. In a s[ense] they may be called the equivalent of a cour[se in] theology, and the fortunate possessor of a s[et of] The Fundamentals is armed and panoplied fo[r the] defense of the faith. The contributors to The F[un]damentals include the best known names in [reli]gious literature to-day, and their articles trea[t] all the questions that men and women who love [the] old Gospel deem most precious.

Our advice to every reader of this journal: Look out for the announcement of The Fundamentals in our next issue and do not fail to secure a [set] for yourself.

To Our Readers

THE attention of all our readers is called to the offer on the third cover page of this issue to send the first six instalments of Pastor Sheldon's new story, "JESUS IS HERE!" to any new addresses not now on our books, for ten cents. We particularly urge every member of the Christian Herald Family to fill out at least one of the coupons with the name of a friend or acquaintance who would be interested in the new story. As we have stated in the announcement, we have great confidence in the spiritualizing effect of the story. We are sure that any person who starts to read it will want to continue to the end. We anticipate for it a popularity greater even than that of "In His Steps."

—CONGRESSMAN CORDELL HULL of Tennessee, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, who drew the income tax section of the tariff bill, has made a personal explanation of the manner in which the new tax will be levied. He says: "Every citizen whose net income exceeds $3,000 will be required to pay a normal tax of one per cent. upon such excess. However, for the year 1913 the tax will be measured by the net income accruing from March 1 to December 31. The taxpayer whose annual net income exceeds $3,000 for the year 1913 will, therefore, only be taxed on that portion of the same accruing from March 1 to December 31. Each taxable person will be furnished a blank return by the District Collector or a deputy, which such taxpayer will be required to properly fill out and return to the office of the collector of the district in which he resides, between January 1 and March 1, 1914. If any taxpayer should fail to receive such blank he will be required under penalty to apply to the collector or a deputy for a blank return. Blanks will probably be on deposit with most postmasters for convenience. Each taxpayer will be notified of the amount of tax due by June, 1914, and will be required to make payment by June 30, 1914. It is estimated that about 425,000 persons will be affected by the new income tax.

Albany Boat Strikes Rock

THREE hundred passengers on the Albany night boat were in imminent peril recently when the Hudson River liner Mohawk ran into the rocks at Hyde Park, near Poughe. The boat was on its way from New York any. The first intimation any of the passenad that anything had gone wrong with the as when she hit the rocks. The boat quivnd rattled as though she would be shaken to Persons who had not gotten into their were thrown down or knocked against the of their staterooms. Some who had gone to ere thrown out on the floor by the concussion. senger relates that a moment after the rocks truck there was pandemonium on deck. Men omen, screaming, and many of them carrying ning children in their arms, dashed for their ooms. Women dropped to their knees and to pray for help. Others fainted, and still simply walked and wrung their hands. All ble hands on the boat were put to work at the s. The steamer Morse, seeing the Mohawk's ss, stood by and offered help, but her captain formed that the Iroquois, a sister boat of the ed one, would be along soon and render all the needed. The Mo- went on the rocks 30 o'clock P.M. and oquois did not ap- till three in the ng. Martyr to X-Ray

AN EXPERT in X-ray work, Dr. Charles Lester Leonard, died recently in Atlantic City, a martyr to the science to which he had devoted himself. From constant exposure to the X-rays, he was stricken with a disease which baffled the best surgeons. Nine years ago the hand that guided the light became affected. Medical skill availed nothing, and the hand was amputated. But the ailment had gone farther, and in a few years the whole arm had to go. It was thought that the trouble was over, and he was arranging to resume practice when he found that the infection had spread through the whole body. He moved to Atlantic City, thinking that the sea air would restore him, but the hope was vain. Harry W. Cox of London, who did so much to develop the X-ray in its early days, and who worked with Sir MacKenzie Davidson, who was knighted for his researches in X-ray work, was infected in the same manner as Dr. Leonard. He lost his hand, then his arm, and then his life. Dr. Baker, a well-known physician of Connecticut, and others have died as victims of the X-ray. In every department of nature there is the greatest need of intelligence and caution, for the elements as subjects are beneficent, as masters they are dangerous and deadly. The very agent he used for the cure of his patients cruelly turned and poisoned him. He was a martyr to his profession as so many physicians are; he died himself in trying to save the lives of others, in imitation of the Perfect Man and Martyr, of whom it was said:

He saved others; himself he cannot save. (Matt. 27: 42.)

THE HUDSON RIVER STEAMER "MOHAWK" ON THE ROCKS

Princess Deaf and Dumb

MARIA CRISTINA, the second daughter and fifth child of the King and Queen of Spain, is deaf, and it is feared will be dumb as well. The Infante Don Jaime, the second child of the royal couple, was born deaf and dumb, and has never spoken, though five years old. This affliction of the little prince has been the great sorrow of the Queen of Spain's life. For a time many attributed the sadness of her appearance to the memory of the anarchist bomb thrown at her bridal carriage on her wedding day, when both the king and she escaped as by a miracle, although fifty persons near by were killed. But it became generally known that the affliction of the prince shadowed her life. Now comes the double sorrow of a princess deaf and dumb. A year ago she sent Dr. Vicente Llorente to New York to investigate the case of Miss Helen Keller, and any new or successful methods of treating such cases, that some relief might be brought to her own. As sorrow begets sympathy for others similarly afflicted, so the heart of Queen Victoria of Spain has gone out to the thousands of deaf and dumb children of her country, and she is now planning new schools for their education, and, if possible, for their cure, thus imitating the spirit of her Lord the Great Physician, who healed the deaf and the dumb, and the spiritual deafness and dumbness their affliction typified.

And he healed him, insomuch that the blind and dumb both spake and saw. (Matt. 12: 22.)

Bribed Telephone Girls

A CURIOUS scandal has just been revealed in Paris in which five female telephone operators are involved. They have been summoned to appear before the Disciplinary Council on a charge of accepting bribes from a Paris grain merchant. It is stated that, owing to the complicity of other officials at a telephone exchange, the grain merchant in question has been informed for some years past of all business transactions by telephone by rival firms, information which he was able to turn to his own benefit. If these charges shall prove true, they will present an example of wrongdoing peculiarly censurable. It is bad enough for a business man to go nosing into the affairs of his rival. When he does so fraudulently with the purpose of gaining an unfair advantage, his conduct is contemptible. The officers were guilty of a double fraud, the one against the rival who had been injured, and the other against the company they betrayed. The worst surprise and shame is that five reputable girls should have been involved in the fault or crime. Girls, as a rule, are singularly honest. Business houses are glad to have them as cashiers. Hence the disappointment that these young women should have yielded to temptation and have fallen. The whole company of wrongdoers are thus described by the psalmist:

In whose hands is mischief, and their right hand is full of bribes. (Ps. 26: 10.)

Old Soldier Won Race

AT THE Grand Army of the Republic reunion at Chattanooga, Tenn., recently, there were games and athletic sports of an intensely interesting character. Colonel J. L. Smith, sixty-nine years of age, retained the G. A. R. speed championship title. The Michigan champion took the one hundred and forty yards dash in the remarkable time of seventeen seconds. In the grueling two and one-half mile contest, Colonel Smith crossed the tape 300 yards ahead of the only other man to finish, H. G. Barnes, sixty-eight, of Pittsburg, Pa. The time was sixteen minutes ten seconds. Fifty years ago all these soldier "boys" were swift of foot and action. Now many of them have gone to camp on the other side of the silent river. Many who remain are rheumatic and disabled in their limbs. It is refreshing to see the veteran in his seventieth year picking himself up and dashing one hundred and fifty yards in a little over a quarter of a minute. There are a good many old men on the track of life, making splendid time. They are in the forefront in the realms of science, literature, art, government and religion. If the men of three score years and ten were suddenly to drop out of life there would be a great gap left. A becoming reverence for age is thus taught in the law:

Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honor the face of the old man, and fear thy God: I am the Lord. (Lev. 19: 32.)

CHINA ORPHANS IN WAR TIME

MISS DIETERLE, missionary of the Door of Hope Mission, Shanghai, China, writes, under date of August 14: "Last Sunday morning, (August 10), we at the Children's Home in Chiangwan (five miles from Shanghai) were suddenly surrounded by soldiers, and the children were much frightened by the shooting. About thirteen holes were shot into the new houses (these were houses built by the CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund). The shooting was not meant for us but for the Northern troops, who that morning advanced to Woosung, the Southern soldiers trying to keep them back. Not being able to do so, before long the village of Chiangwan was full of Northern soldiers, and the village people fled across the fields like wild. I was kept in perfect peace, ready for life or death, as God had decided concerning me. I consulted with the Chinese teachers and found them all in peace of heart, except one, who was much frightened. We put the children in the lower back rooms of the new houses, which were sheltered by the front rooms, and from the back by the kitchens. All prayed, I know, and they were told that now none but God could save them, so each should not look to the teachers but to him alone for salvation. Then we decided to send a man to Shanghai, telling the teachers there of our situation, and asking them to telephone to the railroad station to send a train to Chiangwan, if possible, to get our children. The trains had not been running for several weeks. I wrote the note, and the gatekeeper's husband was willing to take the risk of carrying it. I thought it was brave of him, as he has only recently come out of heathenism, and had heard comparatively little of the Gospel, but he said, 'I'll go, and will trust the heavenly Father to keep me.' His wife wept, but he went.

"Before long the shooting ceased, as the Southern soldiers retreated. We then decided to have the children come out of their back-room retreats and each get together a few clothes ready for our leaving. In less than two hours the train was in Chiangwan, and Dr. MacGillivray and some gentlemen of the Red Cross Society were on our premises ready to escort us to the train. Out came each child, carrying her bundle of clothes, and formed in procession two by two; the Red Cross banner was raised at the head of the line.

"We passed many soldiers with cannon and guns, and the sight would have frightened the children much if the flag with the Red Cross had not been going before them; but they always looked at that and trusted in it and the men who carried it, who, in the minds of the children, were true disciples of Christ, because they carried that flag and the soldiers respected them.

"Before we started we offered our premises to the Red Cross Society for their use during the fighting in Chiangwan and Woosung. They were grateful for this, and raised their flag on our premises, which again was a protection to our property. We had the train stop in front of the new Industrial Home (Door of Hope Mission), which was not yet occupied, and we all went in there. It was like a place prepared of God for us! We had a meeting to praise God, and read Psalms 116, 117, 118, for we were all there and not a hair of our heads injured, and not a child had even fallen on the way to the railroad station. We were all saved by his hand.

"It is now Thursday, and this afternoon we go back to Chiangwan. All are happy to go back. The battle is fought, the Northerners won, and have got the flag of the Republic in its place in Chiangwan and Woosung."

A cable despatch from Nanking, dated September 28, says that the trouble between China and Japan has been adjusted. General Chang Hsun, the commander of the Chinese troops at Nanking, accompanied by a bodyguard of fifty cavalry, went to the Japanese consulate this morning and apologized, in accordance with the Japanese demands in connection with the killing of several Japanese and an insult offered to the Japanese flag. The consul expressed his satisfaction at the action of the Chinese commander.

At three o'clock in the afternoon, 800 of General Chang Hsun's troops, with the republican flag at their head, marched to the Japanese consulate and presented arms, while the commander saluted the consul. The Japanese troops meantime stood at attention. The Chinese authorities at Hankow and Shantung fully complied with the Japanese demands. The apology of General Chang Hsun to the Japanese consulate at Nanking has cleared the air, according to the Japanese officials here, and removes the danger of complications for the present.

Five American missionaries and four Norwegian missionaries are reported as having been captured by Chinese bandits in Hupeh Province. The Americans are Mr. and Mrs. Holmes and one child, and Mr. and Mrs. Fauske. The two latter are workers in the Lutheran Brethren's Mission at Tsaoyang. Some if not all of the captured persons are held for ransom. The leader of the bandits is a notorious freebooter, called White Wolf, whom government troops have been fighting for months, but who has succeeded in evading capture.

SIX GREAT CHRISTIAN CONVENTIO S

MORE than fifty thousand leaders and workers in organized Chris n- ity meet in national conventions and conferences during Octobe d November. There are six great gatherings in four centers. is month there is the general convention of the Protestant Episc al Church and the national convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, w h meet simultaneously in New York City. At the same time the National C cil of Congregationalists meets in Kansas City. Several thousand Disc es of Christ from many States go to Toronto to unite with the Canadian Disc s in a great convention, which is planned as an all-including missionary rally or this denomination. The National Convention of Methodist Men in Indiana is at the end of October is expected to be a repledging of Methodists to the h purposes of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. Finally, in Novem r, comes General Bramwell Booth and a great gathering of the Salvation A y in New York for a home missionary rally.

These six conventions are representative of the deepening interest of and women to-day in religious life and work. It is a time of spiritual co cration and of religious activity which consecration and acti y are measured not so much by thusiastic demonstrations as t are by genuine service. Reli has been rediscovered. This why these conventions are meet and why these thousands are c ing together to talk over the Ki dom of God.

Take the Methodist Men's M ing, for instance. Long before time scheduled for the conventi delegates had been assigned m than enough to fill the largest h obtainable in Indianapolis. So gr was the general interest of Met dists all over the country in t forthcoming meeting, that the rectors had to announce that public would be excluded from t meeting. With such a volume delegates there was no room l for outsiders. By holding overfl meetings and special gatherings various churches, addressed convention leaders, it is hoped get the message before the pub in Indianapolis and convey to some of the enthusiasm which gathering more than three tho sand men from every part of t nation to talk missions and Sund schools and social service and te perance. Former Vice - Preside Fairbanks will preside over t convention.

The Toronto convention of t Disciples of Christ will set forth plan of missionary campaign, bo home and foreign, and will supp inspiration and enthusiasm suf cient to fire the energies of the d nomination to a new standard Christian service.

There will be considerable bus ness and legislation transacted both the Congregational Nation Council and the Episcopal Gener Convention. These two meeting are the regular triennial meeting of their respective denomination and although in Congregationalis the local church maintains its au tonomy, a considerable scope o authority has been delegated to th National Council. This Nationa Council will deal with the questio of changing the organization of th denominational boards, and wit changing the constitution of th National Council itself. Simulta neous with the meeting of the Na tional Council, the American Boar of Commissioners for Foreign Mis sions will hold its annual meetin in Kansas City and there will be strong missionary note running through all the sessions. The meeting of th Brotherhood of St. Andrew in New York will bring the evangelical not into the Episcopal General Convention. The Brotherhood meeting itself wil attract several thousand laymen, and alone would make a notable gathering The General Convention will be concerned with proposed changes in th Prayer-Book, aimed to give greater flexibility and variety to public worship; with the election of new bishops and a reorganization of the general missionary machinery of the church.

Modern Amazons

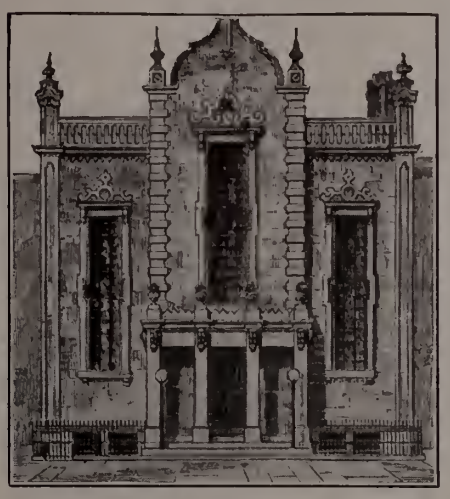
WOMEN are taking an active part in the fighting in Albania, according to despatches received in Vienna from Avlona, the Albanian capital. Many Albanian amazons, armed with hatchets, fought heroically shoulder to shoulder with their husbands, sons and brothers during the street fighting at Dibra on September 23, when 1,200 Servians were killed and 300 taken prisoners of war and the town fell into the hands of the Albanians. The battle was of the most desperate character. The women of the Greek race in southern Albania are also displaying a very warlike spirit. At Koritza, which is held by Greek troops, sixty girls have formed themselves into a company which is drilled by Greek non-commissioned officers. The women declare they would sooner die fighting than permit Koritza to be incorporated in the State of Albania.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S GRANDFATHER'S CHAPEL

"WE ARE very much interested in your President, Mr. Woodrow Wilson of Washington." Such were the words addressed to the writer while visiting the city of Carlisle, England, a few weeks since. Upon inquiring why they were interested in our President, the following facts were given:

"The President's grandfather, the Rev. Thomas Woodrow, was pastor of the Congregational Chapel in our city (Carlisle) for fifteen years, from February 20, 1820, until June, 1835. During this pastorate the mother of President Woodrow Wilson was born in our city." Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will agree with the writer that our Carlisle friends have good reason to be interested in President Wilson. Very interesting details are contained in a pamphlet of some thirty-eight pages, which gives in concise form a short historical sketch of this remarkable church's history. It says:

"Mr. Thomas Woodrow of the Theological Academy, Glasgow, Scotland, received a unanimous call to become pastor of their church; he accepted said call in February, 1820; he was solemnly set apart to the pastoral office." Then follows the order of service. "During Mr. Woodrow's pastorate, he received into the membership 132 members. In June, 1835, Rev. Thomas Woodrow tendered his resignation."



CONGREGATIONAL CHAPEL AT CARLISLE

The chapel in which Mr. Woodrow preached was located on Annetwell Street, near the castle. March 19, 1843, the present chapel was opened on Lowther Street, the Annetwell Street chapel having become too small. The present chapel seats over one thousand persons.

There is evidence that there was a Congregational Church in Carlisle as long ago as 1658. Those good people were in touch with the Pilgrims and Puritans who came over in the Mayflower. I was not surprised to find that the people of Carlisle are interested not only in President Woodrow Wilson but in everything that pertains to the welfare and progress of the United States.

Thinking your readers might enjoy seeing the picture of Lowther Street Congregational Chapel, I am able to present it to them.

(REV.) HERVEY WOOD.

"AN YOU HA' SEEN WHAT I HA' SEEN"

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

I AM sitting in my jerky office chair by the open window—a wide, friendly window that lets in a splash of yellow sunshine and a gentle little breeze. Just a little way below me, the elevated railroad goes thundering past—and below that the trolley cars clang along on bright tracks that stretch out, ribbon-like, through the city; and the automobiles whizz along and the motorcycles and the wagons.

I am looking down from the fifth story, and I see many things, for I am pretending (do you ever pretend?) that this is my first glimpse of New York!

Two small kiddies hurry past with bundles of overcoats piled high on their ragged little shoulders. They are sober-faced mites with cheeks that look pale—even from a fifth-story window. See—they are tramping down a narrow side street that is dark with the dirt of years—they are going to some sweatshop . . .

Behind them walks a woman dressed in the latest style—from a much maligned Paris. A long feather curls downward from a tiny tip-tilted hat that rests on the top of one ear. Her four-inch heels beat a tattoo on the pavement, although I cannot hear it. Her entire costume is of a vivid shade, something between rose color and scarlet, and her cheeks are elaborately tinted to match the dress. She is in no hurry, and walks slowly, drinking in with a visible pleasure the many glances that are thrown in her direction.

A sound of music comes down the street—growing stronger every instant—until finally the strains of "La Marseillaise" sound clear and triumphant. A picture flashes through my mind—a picture of war, of a bloody guillotine, of a dark prison and a rumbling death-cart; but the picture vanishes like a broken bubble when the band comes into sight—suave, placid, fat; dressed in red coats, with flower-decorated buttonholes. They resemble war in the same way that a lazy cat resembles the roaring king of the forests.

A man dashes around the corner and collides violently with a little schoolgirl. Her books fly out of her hands, but the man, with never a backward glance, dashes past. I lean out of the window in my excitement. Is the man a thief, a murderer, or an escaped lunatic? Is he being pursued by an army of trim blue-coated policemen? But no, the man jumps upon the platform of a trolley, and I realize that his reason for the haste was only a small one. Of course, another car would come in a minute, but New York is a city of hurrying people who hate to lose even a minute. Behind him, on the corner, the little schoolgirl pauses to gather her books together. I wonder if chivalry is dead?

As if in answer to my unspoken question, a little old lady comes down the street. She cannot see well—it is shown in her hesitating walk and in the way she carries her little black-bonneted head. She pauses on the street corner—frightened by the noise and hurry that surges around her. A boy steps up—an awkward boy, who is painfully conscious of his hands and feet. He speaks to the little old lady, and then he leads her across to the other corner. And I answer myself: No, chivalry is not dead—even on Third Avenue.

Two thin, bearded foreigners walk along together, talking earnestly. Their hands move in time to the words, and their heads bob up and down like corks upon an ocean of people. They hurry by, absorbed in each other, heedless of the people who step out of their way. And they are still gesticulating madly as they fade from my sight.

Far down the street a crowd of people is coming out of the doorway of a dingy shop. It is too far off to see what is happening—too far off to distinguish the people. Perhaps it is a strike—strikes are always happening in New York—but the people are moving—just a tiny bit—and I can see that somebody is making a speech. He is evidently stopping now, for the crowd is disappearing very fast into side streets, and doorways, and cars.

And so it goes on all day long.

When I was a kiddie in school we used to sing a song called "London Bridge." The song went on to tell how some people walk slowly and some run; how the rich men in their chariots pass the poor men who are walking; how the velvets and satins brush elbows with the rags.

It is like this in New York—from my window. Suffering and want walk stealthily along beside wealth and luxury; sorrow meets joy on every street corner.

I have written this description to answer some questions that have been sent to me from my pen-and-ink friends. The first question was like this:

"What are the New York people doing?"

And the second asked:

"Please tell us what you see on the streets of the city?"

And the third, which was just a bit personal, said:

"What do you do when you are not working, writing letters and articles?"

I think that I have answered all three questions.

When the sun shines low in the evening
O'er the crest of a purple hill;
When the flowers have shut their eyelids
And the bird notes are hushed and still,
Then the same old sun in the same old way
Is gleaming with golden smile,
And is asking the city to fold its hands
And rest for a little while.
But the city is rushing, heedless,
To the end of a weary day;
So the sun lies down with a twilight frown,
And leaves it to go its way.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—REV. W. ALLAN, a well-known Australian minister and Scotch evangelist, has arrived in New York. He has been pastor of one of the largest Baptist churches, and comes with the best credentials his denomination can give. He also bears letters of commendation from leaders in the Presbyterian, Congregational and Methodist Churches. During the week after his arrival he preached at the Fulton Street Noon Prayer Meeting, and has been invited to return and give a fortnight's services there. His address is 794 President Street, Brooklyn.

—MR. F. A. BROWN writes from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Orphanage at Hsuchoufu, China: "We have been blessed with a remarkable revival, after which thirty boys and girls made application for baptism. I have been traveling Y. M. C. A. secretary among schools and colleges in the United States, and I am sure it would be hard to find a group of children of the same age that could compete with them in their knowledge of the Bible. I wish the American supporters of the school could see them all and hear them sing."

—THE NORTHFIELD SCHOOLS at their opening for the fall had the largest attendance in their history, over twelve hundred being registered. As many or more had to be refused admittance on account of lack of facilities. The schools have grown so rapidly that the proportionate growth of the endowment has been outstripped, and there is consequently an annual deficit of about $120,000. There are to-day representatives from thirty-five different countries, exclusive of the United States and its colonies, in the student body, and the believers in nearly every religious creed find entrance here. The work is non-sectarian and international, and its influence is very far-reaching.

—EVANGELIST E. C. MILLER of South Bend, Ind., who has been associated with Rev. W. E. Biederwolf in evangelistic work for some time, is now giving his entire time to the conduct of evangelistic campaigns. Mr. Miller has been closely identified with Christian work for many years and is well known throughout Indiana as the leader of one of the largest men's Bible classes in the State. His meetings among the men in recent campaigns have been large and marked by exceptional power. Mr. Miller is assisted by a small corps of competent and worthy workers. His address is 1151 Vistula Avenue, South Bend, Ind.

MISTAKES OF GOOD MEN*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

AN ANCIENT water famine and what came out of it is the subject matter of our lesson to-day. We who live in a land abounding with springs, lakes, and rivers will find it somewhat difficult to realize the terrors of a water famine. We might possibly imagine a small company of ten, twenty or thirty travelers on a lonely desert, suffering with thirst almost unto death, but can we imagine a company of upwards of one hundred thousand people, together with their cattle, representing the increase of nearly forty years, all thirsty, and no water in sight?

[Some new light has recently been shed on the numbers of Israel's host by Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D., in his book, From the Nile to Nebo. It is a book which any Sunday school should put in its library. Hitherto Israel's host has been stated as numbering from two million to three million. Dr. Hoskins shows conclusively how it could not have been more than one hundred thousand. Dr. Hoskins speaks with authority, because he is the leader of the Syrian Mission, head of the Mission Press, and creator of the Arabic Reference Bible.]

Such was the condition of the Israelites as they neared the border of their Promised Land. They took a very unfair and unkind way to get water, for they organized a riot against Moses and Aaron. They may not have thrown stones or used sticks, but they used bitter words and blamed Moses and Aaron for bringing them out of Egypt as they said, "to die in the wilderness." It was not the first time they had been thirsty in that long pilgrimage, and God had always sent them relief. But they had forgotten and thought only of berating their leaders, Moses and Aaron. Did Moses and Aaron try to reason with them and remind them of their blessings in the past? No, they did something wiser than that: they withdrew from the angry mob and repaired to the Tabernacle, where they fell on their faces before God and prayed to him for help. At once the glory of God—his shining brightness—filled the Tabernacle, and God spoke to them, saying: "Take the rod and assemble the congregation, thou and Aaron thy brother, and speak ye unto the rock before their eyes, that it give forth its water, and thou shalt bring water to them out of the rock; so that thou shalt give the congregation and their cattle drink." It was the precious rod which Moses had so often used before Pharaoh in the time he was working for their deliverance from Egypt. They were still rioting when Moses and Aaron appeared with the rod. "Hear now, ye rebels; shall we bring you forth water out of this rock?" So spoke Moses. He did not speak at all to the rock as God had told him to do, but instead he smote the rock angrily, not once, but twice. Then the rock became as a fountain, and water gushed out of it, torrent-like, so that there was an abundance for all of the people and their cattle.

Was that the last of it? Oh, no. God soon called Moses and Aaron to account because they had struck the rock instead of speaking to it in his name as he had told them. They had allowed their impatience with the people to betray them into disobedience to God. They had cast themselves as a shadow between God and the people. Probably not one in the multitude had said: "How good is our God to satisfy our thirst so abundantly!" but instead many must have said: "Oh, yes, there was water enough when we forced Moses and Aaron to get it for us." And so God was left out. And God said to Moses and Aaron, "Because ye believed not in me to sanctify me (honor me) in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this assembly into the land which I have given them." It fell upon the two aged leaders like a thunderbolt from heaven. We are not told about the agony of soul that must have passed over them. Will any one dare to say that God was too severe with them? No, the rather let us think that God saw in the incident an indication that the two leaders had lost their grip on the people. Later, we will have a lesson on the death of Moses, when it is said that "his natural force had not abated," so it cannot be that this impatience with the people was the result of old age, although he was about one hundred and twenty years old at the time, and Aaron was still older.

When God selected a successor for Moses, he did not appoint a young man, but the next oldest man in Israel, Joshua, who was eighty-three years old. And brave old Caleb came to the front, and when he was eighty-five years old, chose the most difficult part of the land to be possessed, Hebron, where the Anakim giants dwelt. Caleb said: "I am this day four score and five years old. As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day Moses sent me [to spy out the land]; as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, and to go out and to come in." Joshua 14: 10, 11.) Both Joshua and Caleb had kept up their grip on the great work to be done, and God honored them and gave them the hardest places.

Let us be sure that God has use for his workers clear to the end if they will only keep strong and sweet in faith and life. We must also believe that even in youth God will feel it necessary to set aside some teachers because they have lost their hold and make of their teaching a grind.

Let us now drop the incident about Moses and Aaron being called off, believing that God did not do it in anger but in consideration of the two men who had served him as leaders for forty years. Let us enter upon the study of the duty of prayer as a way out of a tangle of difficulties. The source of unfailing help at all times is God himself. He is over all things, under all things, and through all things. Not our closest and dearest friend sees so well what help we need as he does. And certainly no one has a scintilla of the power he has to bring forces for our relief. Why not then go to him in prayer the first thing we do? If the Israelites had stood in their tent doors and besought him for water to quench the thirst, instead of mobbing Moses and Aaron, how quickly God would have opened a fountain for them!

The first rock out of which God brought water for the people was at Horeb, some time during the first year of their pilgrimage, probably very soon after leaving Egypt. The second time is our lesson story for to-day. In time there was an interval of nearly forty years between the two occasions, and the distance was great between them, probably about two hundred miles, for the second miracle of bringing water from the rock was performed at Kadesh-barnea. Recent travelers in that part of the world, notably Rev. Henry Clay Trumbull, D.D., has said: "Standing out from the earth-covered limestone hills was to be seen the large single mass, or a small hill of solid rock, the cliff smitten by Moses. From underneath this rugged spur issues the now abundant stream. The water is remarkably pure and sweet, unequaled by any we had found after leaving the Nile." And so it would seem that the rock at Kadesh-barnea, rather than the one at Horeb, is the true illustration of Christ as the spiritual Rock which has blessed the world for ages, and will go on blessing it until the end of time, and we must believe that it is the one to which the apostle Paul referred.

There is another note of warning to be sounded before leaving this lesson. Possibly it is best suited to those who are young and hot in spirit. Such will be likely to say: "If two such holy men as Moses and Aaron got angry, there is no great harm in my doing it too." Here is a Bible answer for that: "Anger resteth in the bosom of fools."

Here is a little sermon for little men on a great subject. Text: "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." Prov. 16: 32. The text means that one who rules his spirit is more of a general than one that taketh a city but does not control his own passions. Those who master themselves are able to become masters of others. A general needs a spirited horse, but the general must be able to control him or some day the horse will run away with him into the very ranks of the enemy. Instead of having a horse, the horse will have him! Anger is like such a spirited horse. One kind of anger God himself gives to us. He says: "Be ye angry and sin not. Hate what I hate." That means we are to be indignant at wrong and fight it earnestly.

* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for October 26, 1913. The Sin of Moses and Aaron. Num. 20: 1-13. GOLDEN TEXT: "Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Jehovah, my Rock and my Redeemer." Ps. 19: 14, R. V.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—IN RESPONSE TO THE QUESTION: "How can we bring more men, women and children to Sunday school and keep them there?" Mrs. W. E. Erybofer, of the First Methodist Church, Colorado Springs, Col., told how many mothers of young children had been added to the Sunday school and organized in a mother's class. When a child joins the primary class, the name and address is given that same day to the teacher of the mother's class, and several church members living in that vicinity call on the mother in a neighborly way before the day is over, unless she is already connected with the school, and invite her to join the mother's class and bring her baby if she has one, assuring her that in the mother's class it will disturb no one to have a baby talk or walk, or even cry. These mothers sit in the same room as their children of the primary class, with their babies in hand, during the opening exercises, and then they are screened off and taught as a mother's class, usually the uniform lesson, sometimes, also, how to tell stories to their children. They also hold social meetings occasionally between Sundays, which are managed by the mothers themselves, who elect their own president, secretary-treasurer, and committees. At these social gatherings babies also are in order, even when in disorder.

Another novel testimony closely related to the foregoing was that of Miss Mabel L. Bailey, of Janesville, Wis., as to the Baptist Church of that city, the pastor of which sends an invitation to the babies who have been put on the "cradle roll" of the Sunday school by older sisters or brothers or parents to come to church on the next Sunday and bring their parents. The babies are usually on hand in force, and not always in silence, and bring their parents. At a certain time in the service the names of these babies are read, and parents are requested to bring them forward for consecration. As the parents stand before the pulpit with their children, the pastor dedicates the children to Christ and prays that the parents may have grace to train them for God and usefulness. Our readers will at once see that this has the same religious significance as "infant baptism" in other churches. The spiritual consecration of children and parents is essentially the same.

Rev. Frank E. Day of St. Joseph attributed the doubling of his Sunday school chiefly to consecrated political methods. He secured for superintendent an ex-chairman of a county political organization who had carried the county the only time it was ever carried by his party. He resigned his political office and used the methods that had won the county to double the Sunday school. The officers were increased from 29 to 67, about one in each seven of the school membership, and these he met often at luncheons for councils of war, and directed by 'phone on Saturday afternoons and evenings.

LITTLE MOTHER MIWA

BY MARY M. BOWEN, MISSIONARY IN JAPAN

THE morning was so chill. Fuji San had not been well treated and for days he had been in seclusion. Of course, no one knew who had perpetrated an injury, though all must suffer in common.

This was why it was chill, and why Little Mother Miwa's fingers were blue as she wrapped Baby Teruko in her warmest kimonos, three of them, one on top of the other, and held her against her breast for a moment before she carefully tied her on her back.

Teruko took it all with stoical patience. That is the habit of Yamato babies, even if they are miserable, worthless little girls, who have caused their ancestors to blush because of their not having sufficient ambition to be born boys. Strange to say, Little Mother Miwa was glad Teruko was a girl. Yesterday she had been out in a broad hatake, where there were heaps of the worst kinds of rubbish and refuse, and occasionally dismal piles of gray ashes and bits of old take half burned. There had been a recent fire, though it was only hot ashes when she went, with Teruko tied a little closer than usual. Nobody was there. She was free to crouch down and press her brow to the stenchy ground and weep. That is what she did. And she murmured over and over:

"Ah, nozomi ga tsuki, hateru! Awaremi, awaremi, tamae!" "My hope is gone. Pity, ah, pity, whatever god can hear. He who loved us well is now but a heap of ashes. There is not even one yen for rent. Only a handful of rice and one small vegetable. I must go on the street in four days. Ah, my loved Onwa, had thou but taken us with thee!"

Then she sat long in thought. Just one ray of light glinted over her face as she spoke on:

"Yes, I might make the effort. Onwa understood. He had listened to the words of the American sen-sei who stood up so nobly and yet who taught so gently. Onwa passed away in such a peaceful spirit. He begged me to wait and watch until I might find others who wore the Shirushi, the little Jujika. Just one shorter piece straight across a longer one, suspended on the bosom. When I found any one wearing this. I might safely go to them, for they are the Jesus people. I may find one. I will watch."

After the second frightful night had melted away, she ate a very small part of her rice and betook her to the great temple of Asakusa Koen. She also took of her five or six gorin one little coin.

"Ah, if the mother god, or any god, will only hear me this once, for my helpless Teruko!"

How weak she was! She reached her attenuated arms backward and pressed Teruko a little, as if she would lend her strength.

The white doves whirred up from the foot-stained pavements as she passed the fierce-looking old idols that stood guard at the gates. It was quite early and chill; not many were yet out. Slowly, "Tap-tap, tap-tap, tap-tap," went her wooden sandals, her draggled kimono punctuating her steps by comfortless strokes against her bare ankles.

She untied her precious gorin from its little rag receptacle and began to think what sort of prayer would best be said to touch the heart of the very preoccupied god. She reached her scrawny hand and pulled the prayer-bell rope. Mingled voices, foreign ones, fell on her ear. Right there, in the early dawn, all clothed in garments of bewildering warmth and softness, stood two American ladies, one very young and the other older. But it was not the garments she saw. It was the shirushi, the two little pieces of gold, crossed at right angles, and one was on the breast of each.

Her hand fell from the bell-rope. She gasped and stared at them, taking a step downward and backward, as if to approach. This was an act beyond all reason or pardonable courtesy, but it was as though Onwa's prayers had been heard.

"Look at her!" cried the younger to the older. "She acts as though she would speak. She must have known an American somewhere." All the time they were drawing closer and getting acquainted, as women can, just by looking into each other's eyes. Perhaps this is the way we will all talk when we speak the real language of the King.

American-fashion, the elder reached out her hand. But Little Mother Miwa did not understand that. She only knew to fall upon her face, which she did three times. Then she arose, stood half bent, and yet fixed her eyes in fascination upon the cross.

"Let us give her our little Japanese Bible. We can buy another for our collection before we leave Yokohama," said one of the ladies.

They said something she did not understand and held up before her one of the very kind of little books that Onwa kept wrapped in his silk handkerchief, but which was put with certain other articles and sent out to the hatake where are little piles of ashes and burnt fragments of wood.

The elder lady smiled and Little Mother Miwa thought, as she held that small book in her hand, she had never seen anything so beautiful, not even the sun streaming through the wistaria down upon the pond, where stand the sacred cranes. The younger crept up close, and patted the little bundle on her back, and stealthily, lest some one should see and take it away, put into her blue, chill fingers a piece of gold on which was the royal flower of the great emperor of Japan! In all her life she had never held one in her own hand, though quite well she knew its value.

While she was falling on her knees and bending her brow to the ground in a maze of perplexity, doubt and fear that she was either dreaming or that some awful calamity should be awaiting her, the two ladies who seemed to her as angels dropped down from the appeased Fuji San, hastened to the waiting automobile, and she heard one say: "The other parks, then Yokohama."

All this is why there is now a sweet-faced Bible woman, moving like a saint out among the forlorn mothers of Asakusa; and a half-grown girl in training for the work of a Christian teacher in one of the great missions of Japan.

The whispers ceased, and she heard the footsteps of the boys as they moved away. Climbing up on the old Camperdown pew, Miss Maria peered over the fence and caught a glimpse of two sturdy figures going down the road.

Her breast heaved with sundry emotions, but wrath was uppermost. She would go to the justice of the peace, she would, and report what she had heard. But after all, the boys had not decided to come. Randolph Murray, the minister's son, had held back. She remembered that his father and mother had gone to the city to care for a sick relative, leaving him and his younger brother, of whom he had spoken, to the care of a sour-visaged servant.

As Miss Maria stepped down from the pew, the feeling of wrath began to merge into one of perplexity. What would be the best thing to do? With sundry little puffs and gasps she lifted the basket of pears onto the wheelbarrow and trundled them to the shed at the rear of the house. Then she went into her kitchen and started the fire in the stove, for the hour was nearing suppertime.

While she worked she puzzled over her problem, the wrath now and then returning in waves that sent flashes of crimson to her cheeks. Even if she did not report to the justice she would get a couple of men neighbors to come and lie in wait for the marauders.

But a thought kept tugging away at her heartstrings—her heartstrings that were not withered yet, in spite of whims and worries and the burden of years. Might there not be a better way? There was something to be protected beside the pew and her pride. What about the boys? And the church, too. That must be saved from reproach. These were the parsonage boys. The good minister and his wife far away in a house where trouble brooded, the minister's sons at home alone, save for the care of an unsympathetic servant, who thought her duty done when she had made the beds, swept and dusted, and prepared the three daily meals—"And that little scamp, Hal Smith, trying to coax those innocent youngsters into mischief!"

She stood by the kitchen window, slicing a couple of cold boiled potatoes she meant to fry for supper. Her eyes wandered to the yard outside. Everything was radiant with the sunset. The brightest of the slanting beams seemed to rest on the old pew beneath the Vicar of Wakefield pear-tree. There came into Miss Maria's mind the thought of the eternal glory—far, far brighter than earthly sunshine—in which her father was rejoicing.

"If—if he were to come back—just for a little while, I wonder what he'd say about things," she queried to herself.

Then her decision was made. "I don't know that I can work it out," she said. "But I'll try."

The weary-faced maid at the parsonage looked relieved when, half an hour later, Miss Maria Camperdown called with the offer to take Randolph and Robert over to her house for a couple of days.

"Yes'm, it'll be a great help to me, for they have nearly driven me wild. I didn't hire out to look after young ones, anyhow, and besides, I want to get most of the upstairs cleanin' done while Mis' Murray's away. So take them two kids, and welcome, ma'am. And I have no doubt the minister and his wife will be glad to know they are in good hands."

Miss Maria's sitting-room was a lively place that Hallowe'en. A bright fire of old appletree limbs was burning in the fireplace, chestnuts were roasting, corn popping, and a row of rosy-cheeked apples were beginning to show a delicious white juice trickling down their shining sides.

Half a dozen boys were sprawled on the rug before the fire. Miss Maria had told Ran and Rob that they might invite some of their friends. Even Hal Smith, merry, mischievous Hal, was there, "as polite as a basket of chips," the spinster said to herself in surprise.

They must have suspected, she thought, that their plot had been overheard. But all traces of restraint soon wore away. Some of the boys had accepted her invitation, thinking that they would escape early and still have time for some Hallowe'en depredations, even though they should, of course, have to leave their hostess's property unmolested. Gradually, however, the plans for mischief were forgotten. Who cared about prowling around out in the mud and darkness and getting the cops after you when one was having such a fine time in doors, with pumpkin pie, doughnuts and other things as much as one could stuff? And whoever would have thought that the prim Miss Maria Camperdown was so jolly and such a fine story-teller? Talk about Indians—whew! Couldn't she just make the creeps run up and down one's back when she told about the time her great-grandfather and Tim Murphy, the famous scout, were chased by the redskins.

The tall clock in the corner struck eleven before anybody could have believed it was so late, and very regretfully the four lads took their departure, leaving Ran and Rob safe in Miss Maria's keeping. "The very jolliest time—and thank you, ma'am," they said one and all, as they trooped away.

After Miss Maria had seen her two charges tucked away amid the soft wool blankets in the big bed in the comfortable room overhead, where the parlor stovepipe went through, she went and stood in the outside doorway for a minute or two.

The air was chill with autumnal frost; the radiant moonlight showed a silvery rime on grass and shrub. The old pew stood white and distinct beneath the Vicar of Wakefield pear-tree.

"I'll go back to church next Sunday," said Miss Maria to herself. "I guess the new pews will sit pretty good, after all, from what they say."

AFRICAN "WITCH DOCTOR"

"A FEW weeks ago," writes A. M. Anderson, a missionary in Pondoland, South Africa, "we awoke one morning to find that one of the kraals near the mission had been destroyed by fire during the night. On inquiry, we found that the headman had been 'smelt out.' I had had many dealings with the man, and he had been honest and courteous as far as heathen could be. The facts were these: At another kraal about a mile away there was a child, who had been sick about a month. The father called in a native witch-doctor, who decided that the headman living in the kraal near the mission had bewitched the child. The people ran toward the supposed guilty man's kraal. They set fire to his hut, and the owner fled for his life to a neighboring tribe, fifteen miles away. His wife and children were scattered in every direction. A similar case was brought to our attention lately. About nine o'clock one night we saw a blaze to the west of the mission, in the kraal of one of the most respected natives in the community. The witch-doctor, who was consulted about another sick child, pointed out this man as the ontakati or witch. He denied it of course, and protested that he was innocent, and had no ill will toward any one. This, however, only aggravated the people, and his hut was soon in a blaze, and he was beaten by his former friends and neighbors so that in a few days he died."

Why Man of To-day Is Only 50 Per Cent. Efficient

By WALTER GRIFFITH

IF one were to form an opinion from the number of helpful, inspiring and informing articles one sees in the public press and magazines, the purpose of which is to increase our efficiency, he must believe that the entire American Nation is striving for such an end—

And this is so.

The American Man because the race is swifter every day: competition is keener and the stronger the man the greater his capacity to win. The stronger the man the stronger his will and brain, and the greater his ability to match wits and win. The greater his confidence in himself the greater the confidence of other people in him: the keener his wit and the clearer his brain.

The American Woman because she must be competent to rear and manage the family and home, and take all the thought and responsibility from the shoulders of the man whose present-day business burdens are all that he can carry.

Now, what are we doing to secure that efficiency? Much mentally, some of us much physically, but what is the trouble?

We are not really efficient more than half the time. Half the time blue and worried—all the time nervous—some of the time really incapacitated by illness.

There is a reason for this—a practical reason, one that has been known to physicians for quite a period and will be known to the entire World ere long.

That reason is that the human system does not, and will not, rid itself of all the waste which it accumulates under our present mode of living. No matter how regular we are, the food we eat and the sedentary lives we live (even though we do get some exercise) make it impossible; just as impossible as it is for the grate of a stove to rid itself of clinkers.

And the waste does to us exactly what the clinkers do to the stove; make the fire burn low and inefficiently until enough clinkers have accumulated, and then prevent its burning at all.

It has been our habit, after this waste has reduced our efficiency about 75 per cent., to drug ourselves; or, after we have become 100 per cent. inefficient through illness, to still further attempt to rid ourselves of it in the same way—by drugging.

If a clock is not cleaned once in a while it clogs up and stops; the same way with an engine because of the residue which it, itself, accumulates. To clean the clock, you would not put acid on the parts, though you could probably find one that would do the work, nor to clean the engine would you force a cleaner through it that would injure its parts; yet that is the process you employ when you drug the system to rid it of waste.

You would clean your clock and engine with a harmless cleanser that Nature has provided, and you can do exactly the same for yourself, as I will demonstrate before I conclude.

The reason that a physician's first step in illness is to purge the system is that no medicine can take effect nor can the system work properly while the colon (large intestine) is clogged up. If the colon were not clogged up the chances are 10 to 1 that you would not have been ill at all.

It may take some time for the clogging process to reach the stage where it produces real illness, but, no matter how long it takes, while it is going on the functions are not working so as to keep us up to "concert pitch." Our livers are sluggish, we are dull and heavy—slight or severe headaches come on—our sleep does not rest us—in short, we are about 50 per cent. efficient.

And if this condition progresses to where real illness develops, it is impossible to tell what form that illness will take, because—The blood is constantly circulating through the colon and, taking up by absorption the poisons in the waste which it contains, it distributes them throughout the system and weakens it so that we are subject to whatever disease is most prevalent.

The nature of the illness depends on our own little weaknesses and what we are the least able to resist.

These facts are all scientifically correct in every particular, and it has often surprised me that they are not more generally known and appreciated. All we have to do is to consider the treatment that we have received in illness to realize fully how it developed, and the methods used to remove it.

So you see that not only is accumulated waste directly and constantly pulling down our efficiency by making our blood poor and our intellect dull—our spirits low and our ambitions weak, but it is responsible through its weakening and infecting processes for a list of illnesses that if catalogued here would seem almost unbelievable.

It is the direct and immediate cause of that very expensive and dangerous complaint—appendicitis.

If we can successfully eliminate the waste all our functions work properly and in accord—there are no poisons being taken up by the blood, so it is pure and imparts strength to every part of the body instead of weakness—there is nothing to clog up the system and make us bilious, dull and nervously fearful.

With everything working in perfect accord and without obstruction, our brains are clear, our entire physical being is competent to respond quickly to every requirement, and we are 100 per cent. efficient.

Now this waste that I speak of cannot be thoroughly removed by drugs, but even if it could the effect of these drugs on the functions is very unnatural, and if continued becomes a periodical necessity.

Note the opinions on drugging of two most eminent physicians:

Prof. Alonzo Clark, M.D., of the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, says: "All of our curative agents are poisons, and as a consequence, every dose diminishes the patient's vitality."

Prof. Joseph M. Smith, M.D., of the same school, says: "All medicines which enter the circulation poison the blood in the same manner as do the poisons that produce disease."

Now, the internal organism can be kept as sweet and pure and clean as the external and by the same natural, sane method—bathing. By the proper system warm water can be introduced so that the colon is perfectly cleansed and kept pure.

There is no violence in this process—it seems to be just as normal and natural as washing one's hands.

Physicians are taking it up more widely and generally every day, and it seems as though everyone should be informed thoroughly on a practice which, though so rational and simple, is revolutionary in its accomplishments.

This is rather a delicate subject to write of exhaustively in the public press, but Chas. A. Tyrrell, M.D., has prepared an interesting treatise on "Why Man of Today Is Only 50 per cent. Efficient," which treats the subject very exhaustively, and which he will send without cost to any one addressing him at 134 West 65th Street, New York, and mentioning that they have read this article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Personally, I am enthusiastic on Internal Bathing because I have seen what it has done in illness as well as in health, and I believe that every person who wishes to keep in as near a perfect condition as is humanly possible should at least be informed on this subject; he will also probably learn something about himself which he has never known through reading the little book to which I refer.—Advertisement.

CHINA'S OPIUM REBELLION

THE rebellion which has been going on in the Hinghwa region for many months has given splendid opportunity for illegal opium culture. Many thousand acres of poppy have been planted by the people in a large lawless section of the country, depending for protection upon a robber chief calling himself the "Sixteenth Emperor." At various times he has laid assessments of different amounts per acre for the protection he has afforded the people in growing this forbidden crop. Inasmuch as the people can realize from three to four hundred dollars per acre from the poppy, the temptation to grow it has been very great, and thousands have allied themselves with this robber chief. About two months ago, the Hinghwa Mission began a campaign of publicity with a view of bringing this condition to the attention of the government, and thus making it possible for them to destroy the growing poppy before it could become opium. Had the thirty thousand acres of poppy been harvested, it would have been held up as an example of China's inability to carry out her opium reform and would thus have militated against every effort that is being made to prevent the landing of British opium in China and also against efforts to secure recognition of the new republic.

About a month ago, troops began coming in to Hinghwa in greater numbers and a movement began in earnest to destroy the rebels and the growing poppy. There has been considerable fighting, and the whole matter seems to have come to a crisis in a battle in the village of Kiosauh, where our church was burned three weeks ago. In this village, which is nine miles from Hinghwa city, the soldiers' lines were driven back and about half the town looted and burned by the rebels, including our church, in which our pastor and the day-school teacher had their residence. One of our teachers and two church members were captured and held for a large ransom. From this time, however, the troops have been making steady progress. They have burned several villages where the rebels had their headquarters and in a fight recently killed more than three hundred of them. Since that time, no considerable number of rebels have been able to get together, and now the troops are pushing the destruction of the poppy. Evidently frightened by the success of the troops, the rebels who captured the three Christians have released them without ransom.

About two weeks ago, the Foreign Board of Foochow sent an urgent request to the consuls to call in all missionaries in that region, especially the Americans. As conditions were improving quite rapidly, we reported the facts and requested to stay; but soon came two more telegrams from the consul, urging us to leave, and also a report from the local government that a Chinese gunboat was at Antau, our seaport, waiting to take us to Foochow. We dared not disregard these repeated calls, although we felt that the local situation was not serious enough to necessitate our leaving. All our missionaries are now in Foochow, as the governor general has refused to be responsible for our property as long as any Americans remain in Hinghwa against his orders. Some recent bomb-throwing and the discovery of other bombs here in Foochow seem to lend color to this fear. The government allowed us to return to Hinghwa city later, but not to travel in the district, as there is still some disturbance. It is now estimated about nine-tenths of the poppy is destroyed.

AGAINST MORMONISM

THE International Council for Patriotic Service (Incorporated) is a non-sectarian body whose chief purpose at present is to defend the nation and its homes against Mormonism. The president, Miss C. E. Mason, has lately succeeded in placing the Compendium of Mormon Doctrines, the Sunday School Outline, together with the marriage law and the chapter and the passage which teaches polygamy before the Hon. J. C. McReynolds, the attorney general of the United States. She has also received a letter from former Senator George F. Edmunds, in which he says:

"As you and your associates probably understand, the admission of Utah and the other territories into the Union as States withdraws them entirely from the power of the United States regarding their local affairs, among which are the social institutions such as marriage, divorce, etc. It therefore seems clear that the only legal means of dealing with polygamy must be the adoption of an amendment to the constitution of the United States prohibiting polygamy, or authorizing Congress to prohibit and punish it as an offense against the United States. Nothing else can give the United States any right to interfere.

"It is perhaps possible that the transmission through the mails of literature 'teaching plurality of wives' may be an offense within the present post office law, but I greatly doubt that such prosecution would achieve any practical result in overthrowing polygamy. On the whole, therefore, it seems to me that the movement you are prosecuting for an amendment of the constitution of the United States is the only thing that can be done."

In this connection it is of interest to know that the legislatives assemblies of thirty-one States have passed the resolution in favor of an anti-polygamy amendment, leaving only one more necessary to compel Congress to take action.

BIBLE CLASS METHODS

THE work of teaching a Bible class is a most important work, a sacred work indeed; but it is also a work bristling with difficulties.

Perhaps the easiest, as also the most usual, way is for the teacher to sit before the class and just preach a little sermon; but preaching is not teaching. Another, and doubtless better, way is to ask questions; but if the questions are asked of the class in general, the result is apt to be that only a few answer them, a few that have the most confidence if not the most knowledge, while the rest take no part. Such a result, however, might be obviated by asking the questions in turn.

There is a method that some earnest teachers have used with marked success: It is to have each member of the class come prepared to tell which one thing in the lesson interested him or her the most, giving either a verse, an event or a truth.

Another fine method is to write twenty, thirty or even forty questions on a paper and pass the paper around, each member of the class taking two or three questions. This is akin to the method practiced in some Chautauqua circles. It is a method likely to insure careful preparation of the whole lesson on the part of each.

Another plan is to assign the persons of the lesson to one, the places to another, dates, events, doctrines, duties, etc., to others.

It may even be well to use all good methods in succession, alternating one with another, in order both to prove which one is best and to insure an attractive variety.

Of course, the teaching done in our Sunday schools is often inferior to that done in our day schools. But it is a comfort to reflect that while methods are often imperfect, the motives inspiring teachers are almost certain to be pure and good. Personality, influence, count for a great deal, and warm-hearted, enthusiastic teachers, even if their methods be not the best, may do great good and help to make the Sunday school a nursery of the church. Still it is well to aim at the best both in motives and methods; to "covet earnestly the best gifts."

BOWERY MISSION TESTIMONIES

A Drunkard Saved and a Broken Family Reunited

IT COMES naturally to an Irishman to like music. His is the only country that has music on its flag—I mean the harp. If you can remember another, it may be, but I don't. It was a great instrument.

I came into this mission about the month of November, 1910; came down here from Newburgh. I had spent and pawned everything I had. I did not know where to go. I had no place to go and nobody wanted me. I knew nothing about the Bowery Mission. When a boy I had to go to church, and also when I was a soldier; but when I came over to America I never went to a church until I came into this Mission, and when I did come in here I was pretty much under the influence of liquor and I did not take much interest in what they were saying. I came again the next night and I began to think. The third night I heard Mr. Balevre, our organist, and he was telling the people here of the wonderful things which had come into his life. He told that he had been fifteen years away from his home, and had been advertised for and declared dead. So I thought I would give his Gospel plan a trial and I asked God to help me and take away the desire for drink and I would try and serve him faithfully. I asked him very earnestly and he did it and ever since then everything I did has prospered with me. Why, I was getting down to selling papers and digging ditches at $1.25 a day, but I got something better before long. I got another job at $10 a week, and to-day I have something better still, the permission to go and see my family. That was what was troubling me most, my family would have nothing to do with me.

I heard Dr. Hallimond tell that if I got right with God, everything would come right, and that is true. Two months ago I had a wish to go to Philadelphia. I thought I would run down to see how my wife was, so I went there and found the place all closed up. They heard that I was coming and they had packed up and gone elsewhere, and there were the people remarking, "There is Tom Green, and the door is locked." The next thing that came into my head was to go and have a drink; but I stopped and asked God to direct me, and I walked away, and, thank God, I did not take a drink. I have no desire for it now. Drink is not troubling me and now there is as much affection shown me by my family as there was twenty-five years ago.

Won From Sin by a Mother's Prayers

FOURTEEN years ago I came in here not as well as I did to-night, but under entirely different circumstances. I came, not knowing it was the Bowery Mission. On that night I first entered this mission, not knowing that it was a mission. I was more or less tired out and dirty, because all that day I had been riding on a freight car. I had been leading a reckless life and was tired out, and lack of sleep caused me to feel dull. I came in off a freight on the Jersey side and came over here and wandered up through Vesey Street and Park Row up to the mission. It was at 55 Bowery then. I came just as I was. The hall was crowded, as it is to-night. In those days they permitted people to stand, and the hall being crowded, I stood back at the door; but through the testimonies I heard that night, and those taking part, certain better elements in me were touched. Mrs. Bird's presence added a great influence, and I believe that night, fourteen years ago, the 20th of April, as I stood in the old Bowery Mission, was the turning point in my life. I was just a homeless, friendless derelict, without work and with no thought of the morrow. If I did think, it was only to fill me with remorse, for I was always a pessimist because of my habits and my life. I did not want to think of the past. I had a good father who was then living. I did not want to think of the opportunities I had and of the things I might have done, or what might have been if I had done right, but I am glad to bear testimony to every discouraged man in this room that the step I took fourteen years ago I have never regretted. Whatever I have materially—that is as far as outward appearances are concerned—I have because I have been trying to live a right life. My mother had passed over to the heavenly shore, but perhaps that night her prayers were heard, for I stand here to-night a redeemed man by the grace of God.

THE GOSPEL IN A PRISON

FROM time to time in the last few years, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has referred to the remarkable case of an inmate of the Moundsville, W. Va., penitentiary, who was committed to that prison on a five years' sentence. The story of this man and his conversion in prison, and how he came to be a Gospel lightbearer to his fellow prisoners, is told in the Huntington Herald-Dispatch of September 24. His term of imprisonment will soon expire, and he will go forth to freedom and to begin a new life with an aim and purpose in living which he never knew in the old days of worldliness and sin. The Herald-Dispatch says:

"He has earned all the good time allowed by law, and in this way very materially shortened his term. He is laying his plans to come back home to Huntington, where he left his family, to re-enter business. His friends claim that he was not guilty and some proof, it is said, has developed since his conviction tending to substantiate this belief. He was, before the time of his trouble, one of the popular and successful traveling salesmen in the Tri-State region. He commenced working for a Huntington wholesale dry goods house, and so well did he succeed that he attracted the attention of Carson, Pierie & Scott of Chicago, who made him sales manager for several States, with headquarters at Huntington, from which point he traveled with many men under his direction. He was also in the retail merchandise business at Huntington at the time the trouble occurred.

"During his confinement at Moundsville, being a wideawake business man, and having been left in straitened financial circumstances by his trial, he took the agency for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a well-known religious publication, to earn some money for his family. Although his field was limited to the readers behind the dark walls of the penitentiary, he proved to be a first-class circulation-getter and secured about 350 subscriptions to the publication, upon which he received the usual publisher's commission.

"It is said that this publication was eagerly read by the inmates, and that several conversions to Christianity were the direct result of his activity in getting the paper circulated there. Old hardened criminals, as some of them were, had their hearts softened by reading of the good work of the Christian flock in the Lord's broad and fertile fields, and in obedience to his great teachings had their hearts so softened that they fell at his feet and asked for mercy."

A FOOD DRINK
Which Brings Daily Enjoyment

A lady doctor writes:

"Though busy hourly with my own affairs, I will not deny myself the pleasure of taking a few minutes to tell of my enjoyment daily obtained from my morning cup of Postum. It is a food beverage, not an irritant like coffee.

"I began to use Postum 8 years ago, not because I wanted to, but because coffee, which I dearly loved, made my nights long, weary periods to be dreaded and unfitting me for business during the day.

"On advice of a friend, I first tried Postum, making it carefully as suggested on the package. As I had always used 'cream and no sugar,' I mixed my Postum so. It looked good, was clear and fragrant, and it was a pleasure to see the cream color it as my Kentucky friend wanted her coffee to look—'like a new saddle.'

"Then I tasted it critically, for I had tried many 'substitutes' for coffee. I was pleased, yes, satisfied with my Postum in taste and effect, and am yet, being a constant user of it all these years. I continually assure my friends and acquaintances that they will like it in place of coffee, and receive benefit from its use. I have gained weight, can sleep and am not nervous."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for the little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum — must be well boiled.

Instant Postum is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a reason" for Postum.

PROTECTING A CITY'S JUVENILES

OF ALL the agencies for human betterment that exist in the great city of Chicago none is attracting more attention these days than the Juvenile Protective Association. More and more is the world coming to understand that the influences at work upon childhood and young manhood and womanhood shape the destiny of posterity. Correcting the evils which surround the young is therefore a very potent factor in the uplift of humanity. The Juvenile Protective Association believes in publicity as a weapon for correcting social ills. Accordingly, its method of work in overcoming the conditions which it is trying to correct is to make thorough investigations into such unwholesome conditions; reduce the situation in each instance to hard, cold facts; place these facts before the public and then work steadily for laws that will correct them. Its special investigations have come to be regarded by social workers in the light of expert testimony concerning the evils in question.

GERTRUDE HOWE BRITTON
Director, Juvenile Protective Association

This, perhaps, is only the smaller end of the work of the association, for it is concerned daily with the investigation of a multitude of complaints which come within its particular sphere of influence, such as adult delinquency, violations of laws protecting juveniles, crimes of children, and so on. Some five thousand cases are handled by it each year, in all of which the care, protection and interest of the child receive first consideration.

As an example of some of the many cases which daily receive the attention of this organization is noted that of a boy eighteen years of age who came to the city to find work. On his arrival he set out to find a boarding-place. While standing on a street corner he saw two boys go quickly up to a showcase in front of a store, break the glass, take out the goods and run away. A policeman came up hurriedly and promptly arrested the country boy. Charged with being an accessory to the crime, he was sent to prison for six months.

This little incident, when it came to the attention of the association, suggested an investigation of the causes which lead boys into trouble. Accordingly, the cases of one hundred boys then held in the county jail were gone into thoroughly, with the result that the organization has taken a pronounced stand in favor of a public official who shall be known as the "juvenile defender." Inasmuch as there is a public prosecutor to see that criminals are punished, why not, then, the association urges, a public defender to see that the extenuating circumstances connected with a boy's or girl's first offense are brought to the attention of the court? Among other special investigations which this association has made has been one governing the conditions of girls employed in department stores. A study has also been made of the influences which surround young workers in hotels and restaurants.

This organization, whose work is directed by Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton, has been effective in securing much beneficent legislation governing child labor—one result of which is that Illinois possesses one of the best child labor laws of any State in the Union. In light of all this good work one cannot but think of the words of Christ, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me." O. E. C.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Christ and the Modern Social Impulse*

IT CANNOT be an exaggeration to say that there never was a time in the history of the world when so many people were trying to help so many other people as to-day. What has done it? The Christian knows. It is the Spirit and the message, the sacrifice and the personality of Christ.

It almost makes one tremble to try to realize the gravity of the hour to which the ages have come. There never was a time when the world was so ripe for the real message of the Gospel. Christ came "in the fulness of time" when the world could receive the beginnings of his message; now, after nearly two thousand years, the human race is more ready than it has ever been to acknowledge that the message of Jesus is the one thing which it needs.

It has happened like this. The study of sociology has been progressing gradually, some of its most earnest and its brightest scholars working outside the Christian faith. They did not care about the authority of Christ and the inspiration of his message. They were studying man and the earth, not God and heaven. And they found that the thing that is hampering and spoiling life is selfishness. They found that selfishness is unscientific, unreasonable. They found that co-operation, that interest in one another is the only reasonable way to live. So we have come to see just from a natural and earthly standpoint what a preposterous and ridiculous and disastrous policy selfishness is. Society and civilization mean co-operation.

And now the church has the opportunity of saying to the world: "Of course!" It can say: "Our Master said that two thousand years ago. It has taken you all this time to see that what he said was right."

The time is ripe for the church to drive home its message. It is another instance of the law of supply and demand. The world is demanding a policy of unselfishness that shall be practicable. It needs not only a theory but a power. The church has precisely what the world needs and what it realizes its need of as never before.

It is a grievous thing that in so many instances the church, as represented by individuals or organizations, has failed to show this spirit of unselfishness which Jesus demanded of his followers. Indeed, the accusation is often heard that it has at times set itself definitely against the movements which were working for the emancipation and the betterment of mankind. But its members are more eager now than ever to be what Christ meant them to be—the servants and helpers of their neighbors and of the world.

The program of Christ is very deep and radical as well as very far-reaching. It calls for a surrender of every soul to himself so complete as to be like death. The great apostle to the Gentiles insisted and boasted that he had been slain, that he was dead. "God forbid," he cried, "that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ by whom the world is crucified unto me and I unto the world." "I am crucified with Christ," he said again. And to his followers he wrote: "For ye are dead and your life is hid with Christ in God." This sounds like extravagant language, but he meant it. He meant that the old life of self-will and greed was dead. What he wanted now for himself was not his way but God's way, and he knew that God's way was the welfare and the salvation of all.

Note the sublime kingship of Jesus. He strides forth among men to-day, holding in his hand the magic that will solve our problems and bring us what we need. He has the message the world is waiting to hear; he is the example the world must try to follow; he has the power to change our hearts so that we shall be able to live up to the new requirements of the new age, which are the requirements he established long ago.

Missionary Essentials*

SOME things cannot be sent for; they must be gone after. That was the way God found it with the world. He had sent lawgiver and prophets to bring men back to him, but to really get us he had to come for us himself.

And the heathen can be won to Christ only as somebody who has Christ in his heart goes after them. Did you ever stop to think what your life would be like to-day if somebody centuries ago had not come with the Gospel to the land where your ancestors lived? We were all "heathen" once, most of us belonging to those wild tribes whom the Romans called "barbarians." But the Gospel came—through central and northern Europe, over to England and Ireland—and those tribes became Christian. And because somebody brought that message then we are Christians now.

The gift has been given to us that we may pass it on. It is a fine thing to study about missions, to pray about them, to give for them—but the one essential thing is to go. Some one must do that or those sheep of the other fold will not be brought in.

Who shall go? Suppose every one said: "The call cannot be for me. It must mean some one else." Many have gone; many are going; many will go. Keep your heart and mind open so that you are ready to say at any time: "Here am I. Send me."

In talking about "going," the element of sacrifice has at times been over-emphasized. It is a sacrifice, but people make the same sort of sacrifices for other causes. A young man is delighted and honored to get a foreign post to represent some great industrial concern; an older man covets a diplomatic post. Here is the offer of a position to represent the King of kings in another land. To accept it would be the greatest honor that could possibly come to any life.

A congregation had gathered once to bid farewell to a young missionary who was about to sail to the foreign field. There was an air of sadness in the service; the first speakers had emphasized the great sacrifice the young man was making. But when it came time for his address he announced as his text: "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given: that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ."

BIBLE CLASS PIONEER

HOW many times in your life, when depressions were numerous, and glittering gold was about you, have you pos- l the great desire to be a mil- re? We have all experienced feelings, desiring to become weal- a worldly sense, and to satisfy l desires with the golden dollars. is a man who has a deep desire come a millionaire; but not of ust of gold. He is in search af- odliness. His trail has been a and difficult one, for he is the nce agent of religious awaken- He has been typified "the mod- apostle of the Bible class." The army that is following in the teps of "Father Hudson" to-day mighty congregation of young le, representing some thirty de- nations of churches, and that circles the whole Christian n. In far and remote mission s are Bible classes founded under Hudson's plan, while the people r north Alaska each Sabbath are ying the Bible under the direction is thought. The motto that went h from Mr. Hudson's original Bi- class, founded in Syracuse, N. Y., home city, in 1890, is, "We do gs," based on Phil. 4: 13: "I can all things through Christ which ngtheneth me."

ut why do I call him a would-be ionaire! Because he is. He de- s to enlist in his lifetime one mil- young people for the Cross of ist. "A Million Members for ist," reads the aim of the Baraca- lathea Union, a world's organiza- n. The mark is nearly reached, these men and women will not nd idly by after that grand num- has been enlisted. "Still the nbers increase."

The year 1912 saw nearly twenty usand young men and women become members of the respective churches, of which the Baraca-Philathea Bible Classes are a subdivided organization, through the influences which these Bible classes exerted. It is a militant organization, this Baraca-Philathea, fighting sin and its world, and conquering through the "blood of the Lamb." The name Baraca is from the word "Berachah," found in II Chron. 20: 26, where we read that the children of Israel, after their victory over the Moabites, held a praise service in the valley which they named "Berachah," meaning "blessing."

These classes have a wonderful plan for soul-seeking, personal work methods being of such a type as to enlist thousands each year. The consecrated members of these Bible classes gather together at certain dates, discuss the various unsaved individuals of the class and city or town, then kneel in prayer for strength to convince these of the Truth. Then they go out into the world, pray each noon or night for five minutes for greater strength, and are continually laboring that these may become members of the greater Bible class—the church—saved through the blood of Christ.

Little did Marshall A. Hudson dream that he was to prove the founder of the great religious organizations that these have proven in their united institution, when he stood before the first Bible class in that Syracuse church, and at that date he did not desire to possess a million young men and women in his following. Only later, after he retired from one of the most successful business pursuits, with its chain of establishments, of which he was sole owner, did he possess the great desire after the hearts of men and women for the cause of the Master.

A METHODIST PASTOR'S VIEW

WE HAVE received from a reader in Long Island—a Methodist minister—the following wholly unsolicited ter, which we commend to other eachers, who may find in it some lpful practical suggestions that may made available in their ministerial ork. Thousands of pastors in all rts of the country can bear similar stimony to the great aid THE CHRISAN HERALD has been to them in their inistry:

"I have been a reader of THE CHRISAN HERALD for more than twenty ears. Its weekly visits to my home uring that momentous period have er brought me pleasure, and what I ow write as an ex-newspaper man of ght years' experience is prompted y a deep sense of gratitude.

"As a pastor of the Methodist Episopal Church, I have considerable acuaintance with current religious terature, and I regard THE CHRISIAN HERALD as one of the very best amily papers published. Indeed I elieve it leads the procession as a ournal adapted to the moral and piritual needs of the home. The ange of its information is as comprehensive as it is varied; and the ictorial feature, in which the most listinguished preachers, missionaries, hilanthropists, statesmen and educaors of the age and the most interesting localities on the earth are preented before your readers, is not the least of its many fascinations.

"Whether the contributed articles appearing in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD deal with modern discovery, Bible archeology, philosophy, sociology, missionary and educational work, the management of prisons, the reform of State and municipal government, city missions, the high cost of living, or any other of the vital questions of our time, they are always written in a style adapted to the average reader; they are transparent and direct. Your readers are kept informed on all the important happenings in every part of the world. When earthquake, or tornado, or famine, or flood, or pestilence smites humanity anywhere, and starts the superficial to interrogating the goodness of God, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is prompt with the most reliable information and with fervent appeals for the sufferers, which ever meet with a generous and ready response. This is the highest type of practical Christianity.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in touch with the latest thought from the field of modern criticism, but is neither intimidated nor deceived by what the critics say, knowing that most of the assumptions of this discordant fraternity are without valid basis.

"The editorials are bright, progressive, discriminating, spiritual. I read them always with the keenest relish. Doctor Jowett's "Daily Meditations" I richly enjoy. They are stimulating and illuminating expositions of the Word of God. How they do uplift the soul!

"In conclusion I want to express the pleasure I feel that among your thousands of readers are some of my dearest friends; THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a weekly benediction to them. They long for it. They appreciate it, as they do epistles from those they love. Gratitude for the help it has been to me for so many years in my work as a pastor and preacher, as well as in the nurture of my personal character, compels me to send you unsolicited this heartfelt testimonial. I believe in scattering the flowers along the path of life, as well as in placing them on the lonely grave where they wither in a day.

"Cordially yours,
"W. MACNICHOLL."

This is the guarantee with every box of Holeproof Socks or Stockings—"These six pairs will last six months or you get new hose free." A guarantee ticket, with six coupons attached, is given with every box by all dealers, and signed with the dealer's name. If one or all pairs wear out in six months send the hose back to us with a coupon for each pair and get your new pairs free. That is all there is to it.

More than a million men, women and children are wearing Holeproof Hose today because they wear far better than any hose they know. And because they are soft and stylish, and are made in the lightest weights.

The 25c Grade—Mercerized

We pay an average of 74c a pound for the yarn in Holeproof. Common yarn sells for 32c. Yet we sell light weight, MERCERIZED socks for men at only $1.50 for six pairs. Our process of mercerizing alone adds 22% to the strength. Our yarn is of three soft, pliable strands. That insures comfort. Equal hose can't be sold at Holeproof prices by any concern with a lesser output. You have paid more for hose not nearly so good—hose not even guaranteed. Don't you want to try—

ANSWERED PRAYERS

MOST of our Answered Prayer correspondence is, of course, from homes in the United States, but this week a letter comes all the way from Norway. It is postmarked "Arendal," and is written in plain and correct English, though the letters bear unmistakable signs of having been penned by a native of another land. "I wish to thank my heavenly Father," writes our friend from Arendal, "for his great kindness and condescension in answering my prayers in a great financial difficulty. There seemed no way out, and I went 'into my closet' and in the name of his dear Son pleaded his promise: 'Call unto me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee.' The help came wonderfully, praised be his name."

Miss B. E. D., of Corydon, Ky., writes: "I wish to testify to God's goodness in hearing and answering prayer. I thank him most earnestly for restoring my dear, aged father's sight." Many letters tell of relief from pain. Occasionally one comes telling, not of deliverance, but of grace given to bear the affliction. Mrs. M. S., of Allentown, Pa., writes: "I am an invalid, and a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through the kindness of a friend. I want to acknowledge through your paper that I believe in prayer and that God has answered many prayers for me and given me grace to bear pain. He has also helped me in times of financial trouble."

Mrs. M. H. D. writes from Spartanburg, S. C.: "I cannot tell the times my prayers have been answered; I have been restored to health and strength; my prayers were answered when our oldest boy was dangerously ill, and when my youngest boy had been given up by the physicians. God is still blessing me and mine." Mrs. I. K. C., of Coleridge, N. C., writes: "I want to testify to God's goodness in answering my prayer. My little grandson was very low with diphtheria. I prayed to God to heal him, and he is restored to health." Mrs. L. W. H., of Searsmont, Me., writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answer to prayer in restoring my daughter to health. I, too, have been very sick in the past few weeks, but the dear Lord has again strengthened me in answer to prayer." Mrs. J. A. H., of Dykes, Mo., writes: "I want to tell of God's goodness in hearing and answering prayer for my little girl's health. He has answered many other prayers for me." M. V. F., of Oskaloosa, Iowa, writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in restoring my mother to health, and to thank him for many other blessings."

A Reader writes from Missouri: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering my prayers for blessings which I eagerly desired; especially for my school work, which seemed a direct answer. I am still praying for more faith." Mrs. W. J. T., of Watertown, Wis., writes: "We were facing a great injustice and everything seemed dark and discouraging, but we simply relied on those promises in God's Word which applied to us, and our faith was abundantly rewarded. God has answered many other prayers for us, and he seems more and more a precious reality."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayers have also been received from:

books have been written: The Church and the Open Country, by Wilson; The Country Church and the Rural Problem by Butterfield, and the book which has attracted so much attention and been adopted by the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, The Country Church, by Otis Gill and Gifford Pinchot. The Council has appointed Mr. Gill to lead the churches to carry out the recommendations of the book. As a wholesome balance to works like these, which are inclined to take a somewhat gloomy view of present-day church conditions in the country, look up your CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 3, and read again Dr. Steffens' article on "Is the Country Church Declining?"

The Home Mission Board of the Baptist Church is laboring to meet the needs of rural communities. Ohio is divided into five districts, superintended by a pastor-at-large, who has arranged the churches into groups, holding meetings and institutes and giving needed counsel. Minnesota Baptists have a commission on rural life. Arizona has more rural Baptist churches than all other denominations combined. Rev. Richmond A. Smith, who made a notable success of rural work at Jordan's Grove Baptist Church, Iowa, has been appointed superintendent of the country churches of that State.

Dr. Steffens is undoubtedly right in asserting that the church of Jesus cannot fail in rural districts any more than it can fail anywhere else. The church was founded in the open air. Its Founder and his closest companions were out-door men. Throughout the centuries it has flourished in country places. Present-day American civilization owes much to the open-air preaching, to the camp meetings and the great revivals of its early church life. What memories are sweeter than the memories of old-time revivals to which we drove through snow-covered fields in winter, or the camp-meeting blessings of summer days!

What the country church needs more than anything else is a renewal of the old times of spiritual power. The old Gospel has not changed. However rural conditions may have altered, it still has power to win the people to righteousness and to God.

OUR FIREMEN

OVER the country far and wide
They answer the roll-call, a gallant band.
Never a sword clanks by their side,
Never a pistol gleams in their hand.
But wherever the firefiend laughs in glee,
Where the breakers roar, and the death-damps lurk,
In city and desert, on land and sea,
Are found the heroes who never shirk.

Not theirs the trappings and gauds of war,
Trumpet and drum-call, and flags unfurled,
Plaudits of thousands who view afar
The warrior sons of a war-mad world;
Only the work that is theirs to do,
And the heart to do it, that is all.
There are few cheers when they struggle through,
And scarcely a tear when they faint and fall.

Nazarene, in earth's kingdoms wide
Uncrowned go thy heroes of sea and land.
Strike from blind eyes the scales of pride;
Give our dull hearts to understand
That station nor glory count with thee:
Only the doer and the deed:
And bravest of all thy brave is he Who dies, like thee, for another's need.

"JESUS IS HERE"

THE announcement that the first chapter of Pastor Sheldon's great story "JESUS IS HERE!" will be published in our issue of October 22 has created the greatest enthusiasm among our readers; and we are in receipt of letters from all over the country, assuring us of the co-operation of members of the Christian Herald Family in causing the story to be read as widely as possible. Already hundreds of readers have sent in subscriptions in the names of friends whom they desire to share the spiritual uplift which every one who reads this wonderful story must experience. And we are in receipt of a number of suggestions for extending the scope of our effort in behalf of giving it the widest possible audience. Among others we have received the following letter:

Vineland, N. J.

Dear Christian Herald:—Allow me to suggest that you send out coupons for ten-cent subscriptions to your paper for a short time. If in some way a coupon could be used that would show a ten-cent subscription to your paper, it seems to me that many would be glad to give their friends this small gift. Then, too, a dime can so easily be mailed with the coupon, and that little item of being convenient counts for much. C. W. G.

This seemed to us to be so good a suggestion that we at once determined to apply it, by offering to send the first six instalments of Pastor Sheldon's new story, that is to say, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for six weeks, on receipt of one of the coupons printed on this page, accompanied by ten cents. This will give every member of the Christian Herald Family an opportunity to place his or her favorite paper in as many as ten new homes at absolutely nominal cost. If you can think of a single friend whom you wish to be benefited by this simple plan, send a coupon and ask him or her to subscribe. If you prefer to send the dime yourself, enclose it in an envelope, accompanied by a coupon properly made out, and we will take the risk of its reaching us safely. If you have ten friends who would be benefited by reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, fill out their names on the coupons and send them in an envelope with one dollar and we will see that the subscriptions are filled. Do this at once so that your friends may be sure to receive the large anniversary number containing the first instalment of the Sheldon story, as well as many notable features commemorating the thirty-fifth birthday of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Be sure that each subscription is a New one—that is to say, the person to whom it will be sent must not be a present subscriber. Our old friends will be sure to remain with us. They will have the opportunity to read the new story, in any event; but we want to place it in as many new homes as possible.

We could not afford to make this sacrifice if we were not sure that every person who once begins to read Pastor Sheldon's story will wish to continue to the end. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a habit in hundreds of thousands of homes, for once a person makes a practice of reading it, it is very hard to do without it. The spiritual influence of the paper is cumulative. Every reading binds one more closely to the special interest of the Family, which is the uplift of humanity and the spread of Christian principles throughout the world. We strongly commend this to your approval, as in the highest sense a missionary enterprise.

We ask all readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to bring this offer to the attention of their pastors, and to ask them to bring it in turn to the attention of their congregations.

But you must send in the coupons immediately, as but One Week remains before the first instalment of the Sheldon story will be published.

QUEEN OF SHEBA'S VISIT TO KING SOLOMON

THE Queen of Sheba's Visit to King Solomon is one of the most famous incidents in the history of the ancient world. The oriental magnificence of King Solomon's Court brought forth the exclamation, "The half has never been told!" The beautiful picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, illustrates but ONE event out of all the THOUSANDS that make up the history of every nation, ancient and modern, all accurately and entertainingly told in the world-famed publication,

Ridpath's History of the World

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, IN REVIEWING THIS GREAT PUBLICATION, SAID IN PART: "Ridpath's History of the World may be regarded as a complete library in itself. No other work of its kind has ever supplied a History so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men. We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent Hand, guiding and developing all things. We cheerfully commend this most popular and complete of all world histories to our readers."

NEVER AGAIN SUCH A BOOK BARGAIN AS THIS!

We will name our price only in direct letters to those sending the coupon below. Tear off the coupon, write name and address plainly and mail now before you forget it. Dr. Ridpath's widow derives her income from his History, and to print our price broadcast for the sake of more quickly selling these few sets would cause great injury to future sales. President McKinley said: "I am familiar with the merits of Ridpath's History of the World, and cordially commend it to the scholar as well as to the plain people generally."

William J. Bryan said: "Dr. Ridpath's History of the World is a lasting monument to the author's intelligence and industry. It is thorough and comprehensive."

President Warren Boston University, said: "I should be glad to see it placed in the library of every young person in the United States, and even in the English-speaking world. In families where there are bright children it will render excellent service to the cause of popular intelligence."

Bishop Vincent said: "Ridpath's History is in clear and agreeable style, comprehensive in treatment, readable type and admirable illustrations. This set of books is a permanent college chair of general history in one's own house."

DR. Ridpath gives the history of every religion of mankind, and shows the slow but sure progress that has been made from Paganism to Christianity, from darkness to light. The customs and habits of people, the development of their science and literature and art, the growth of religion and education form a very vital part of this history, and that which gives the work its lasting popularity is the wonderfully beautiful and fascinating style in which it is written. To read this work is not only to increase one's fund of knowledge, but to improve the literary style in which we write or speak, and to expand and develop the mental powers.

EVERY American citizen should know the history of his own country and the world to intelligently perform his full duty as a citizen. How else are we to judge of the great national questions that crowd upon us for decision? Read the history of mighty Babylon or of imperial Rome, and familiarize yourself with her growth, development and decay. Then, when you know the cause of the rise and downfall of empires and nations, you will be able to intelligently discuss and decide the great questions that are pressing now everywhere for attention.

RIDPATH throws the mantle of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there; patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles with three hundred and fifty Greek ships smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there, gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century—the most colossal world-figure of his time!

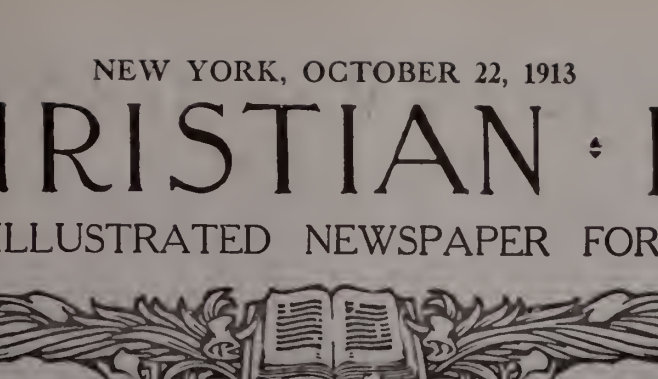
UNITING THE TWO GREAT OCEANS

BY J. MACKLIN BEATTIE, Ancon, Canal Zone

BEFORE this reaches the eyes of the CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, the great act will have been accomplished—the last obstruction in the waterway that connects the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans will have been blown away. This has been fixed for October 10. It will be accompanied by no fanfare of trumpets nor military display, nor even by a single hour's interruption of the work. The sight of the blowing up of Gamboa Dike will be witnessed by thousands of people, gathered on the hillsides at the north end of Culebra, yet it will hardly be spectacular. The dike has been drilled with deep holes, and into these one hundred pounds of dynamite have been loaded. At a signal, the blast goes off. Masses of rock and earth will leap into the air twenty-five to fifty feet; but there will be no rush of water, merely a quiet joining of the two bodies through innumerable little streams that reach out like fingers from the lake toward the cut. Gradually these little streams will broaden. Rock and earth will appear like small islets along the line of the exploded dike, above the surface of the water. Nine miles south of the dike a little wave will be set in motion by the water from the lake, and will lap against the gates at Pedro Miguel locks, and tiny streams will trickle down through and find their way, within a few hours, to the Pacific Ocean. On the Atlantic side, a similar stream will join the lake, and, flowing on, will reach the water of the Caribbean Sea.



In the sense that a water channel exists between the two oceans, the Panama Canal is completed. But in one part of Culebra Cut the water stands only five feet high, so that navigation is possible only to ships of the lightest draft. But the water from Gatun Lake is filling in rapidly, and within the year the Imperator, or any one of the big naval vessels, will be able to pass through the canal. The formal opening of the canal is scheduled for January 1, 1915, but the actual beginning of water connection between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans across the Isthmus of Panama will be historically reckoned from the event of October 10.

What remains to be done is to remove about ten million cubic yards of earth and rock, complete the installation of machinery in the locks, and finish the work already begun of constructing dry docks, wharves, machine shops, and coal-pockets at either terminal of the canal; and to complete the fortifications at either entrance, and land defenses to repel flank attacks, 75 per cent. of which are already constructed.

The chief obstacle to navigation now lies in the slides in the Culebra Cut that have blocked up the channel. Since the first steam shovels were installed in the cut in 1906, there has been no day on which these slides have not interfered with the progress of the excavation. Throughout the entire section, nine miles in length, there is not a part where the banks have not moved at some time during excavation. These movements of the banks have been the most serious at the highest point in the divide, where the canal, following the line of the prehistoric river, passes between two hills. These hills are great boulders pushed up from the subterranean streams of lava, and surrounded by masses of earth and rock. The now famous slide is known as the Cucurache slide, on the east bank of the canal, just south of Gold Hill, which is the highest point in the cut. Of these slides, Mr. Joseph Bucklin Bishop, in his authoritative book, The Panama Gateway, says: "There were at various times during the canal construction 22 slides of various kinds, covering an area aggregating 220 acres, and compelling an excavation of 25,000,000 cubic yards, or about one-fourth of the excavation of the Culebra Cut. The delay did not affect the date of the completion of the canal. In spite of the addition of 25,000,000 cubic yards of slide excavation, the Culebra Cut was ready for use when the condition of the lock work allowed the water to be turned in."

THE SAFETY GATES AT GATUN — THE MIRAFLORES LOCKS — THE PEDRO MIGUEL LOCKS

September 25 (old style), 1513. The real history of Panama is the history of the Canal. The early Spanish explorers employed the two rivers through whose valleys the Panama Canal has been built. They would row their boats from the Pacific side to the Rio Grande, to the head of navigation, whence they would carry them across the continental divide, through the pass at Culebra Cut, floating them again in a tributary of the Chagres River until they reached the Atlantic Ocean. Because of the commercial use of these tributary streams, the Chagres was explored and used as one of the routes for carrying merchandise and treasure across the Isthmus.

The first plans for building a canal to connect the two rivers was broached in 1534, but the undertaking was too stupendous to be considered even by so intrepid a monarch as Charles the First. Later, the Catholic Church in Spain interfered, and the project was placed under a ban by papal decree. In 1800 Humboldt promulgated the plan in one of the books containing the reports of his voyages and explorations. In 1820, one of the revolutionary governments of Spain directed that surveys be made, but the plan came to nothing; and in 1825 the new government of Colombia had a reconnaissance survey made, but the undertaking was too great for the country to consider. The attempt of the French company to construct the Panama Canal was one of the boldest, most courageous, and tragic construction enterprises ever undertaken. Its history is too well known to require further telling here.

In 1902 Congress authorized the President of the United States to purchase the rights of the French in Panama. The government of Colombia hesitated to grant the kind of concession the United States desired, on account of constitutional provisions regarding the alienation of the nation's territory, and because the price offered was considered insufficient. In November the Republic of Panama was formed, and it has granted to the United States Government a concession by which the rights of sovereignty were ceded to the United States over a territory extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific and ten miles wide.

Two years later, a working force of Spaniards and West Indian negroes for laboring positions, and of Americans for the engineering and administrative forces, was organized; houses were built, a public health organization was perfected, yellow fever was eradicated from the Isthmus, and the plant which completed the Panama Canal was established on a working basis.

In 1906 the plan of the canal was determined. Briefly, it is this: the waterway is 50 miles long; the least depth is 41 1-3 feet, and the least width 500 feet, through Culebra Cut. There is a channel at sea level on the Atlantic side, extending inland seven miles from deep water to Gatun. Here, a flight of three locks raises the vessel to the level of Gatun Lake, 85 feet above sea level. The lake extends through the valley of the Chagres and through the trench known as Culebra Cut, a distance of 32 miles, to a point on the Pacific side of the continental divide, known as Pedro Miguel. Here, one lock effects the lift from the lake level 25 feet to a small lake one and one-half n square. The lift from this lake to sea level is fected at Miraflores in a series of two locks. high level is maintained by a dam one and one- miles long, thrown across the valley of the Cha at Gatun. This forms Gatun Lake, a sheet water which has an area of 164 sq miles. Through the lake the ship chann from 500 to 1,000 feet broad.

THE ROUTE OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The Panama Canal Describe

A GLANCE at the map of the canal sh s that from Colon at the Atlantic end o Panama at the Pacific end the direction s from northwest to southeast, and not fr east to west as generally supposed by th who have not given the subject attenti Gatun Lake, which makes half of the ca a lake canal, is a body of fresh water, w an area of one hundred and sixty-f square miles, brought into existence damming the waters of the Chagres Riv at Gatun.

Gatun Dam is only remarkable for hugeness and the incredibly short time which Colonel Goethals and his men c structed it. It is an artificial ridge, uniti the hills on either side of the Chagres V ley, one and a half miles long, nearly half mile wide at the base, about four hundr feet wide at water-level, and about one hu dred feet at the top.

Figures on excavation will give some id of the work. For this there were one hu dred steam-shovels and eighteen dredges almost constant use. The dippers on t large shovels have a capacity for scoopi five cubic yards. A cubic yard of earth, pla measurement, weighs about a ton and a half, and cubic yard of rock nearly two tons. To get so idea of the astounding amount of labor in dry exc vation, take the Culebra Cut, where forty-thr steam shovels were in operation at one time. working from one level to lower level, the shovels firs made the "pilot cut," thirty four feet at the botto fifty feet at the top, an from fifteen to twenty fee deep. The pilot shovels ar followed on each side of thi cut by shovels widening i by taking twenty-six-foo slices. Imagine the numbe of dump cars, locomotives and miles of trackage tha must be constantly shifte in caring for this material which in some instances was carried thirty miles. The dumped earth and rock wa leveled by steam spreaders. The excavation in the cut is an average of two hundred feet in depth; besides the great land-slides which have made much extra work, and which more than anything else disheartened the French company in the final years of its operations.

A VIEW OF THE GATUN LOCKS

MISSIONARIES HELD FOR RANSOM

IN LAST week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was printed the announcement of a party of missionaries—Americans Norwegians—having been captured by bandits Tsaoyang, in the interior province of Hupeh, and d for ransom. It was feared that in the pres- unsettled condition of affairs in many parts of republic, the missionaries might be made to suf- the fate of others who have fallen victims to the ive opposition to foreigners. This apprehension s strengthened by the report that one of the ldren belonging to the missionary party had been killed and that the lives of the whole party were in terrible danger.

On learning the situation THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cabled to Hon. E. T. Williams, chargé d'affaires, United States legation, Peking, inquiring the amount of ransom demanded by the bandits for the release of the missionaries. Mr. Williams sent the following cablegram in reply:

"PEKING, October 4.

"Christian Herald, New York.

"I telegraphed to mission at Fancheng, which replies that amount of ransom is unknown as yet, but that two Americans have gone to Tsaoyang to attempt negotiations with bandits.

(Signed) "WILLIAMS."

On October 6 more cheerful news came from Peking. A message, dated October 3, had been received at Siangyangfu in the province of Hupeh, from the Rev. Christian Stokstad and the Rev. Mr. Johnson, the two American missionaries trying to negotiate with the Chinese bandits for the release of the American and Norwegian missionaries held in captivity at Tsaoyang. This message said that three white women and two children are at the bandits' headquarters and have not been harmed, while the men are believed to be living. This message relieves the situation and contradicts the report that the little son of the Rev. Mr. Fauske and Mrs. Fauske had been killed. It expresses the hope that the force of 1,800 Chinese troops around Tsaoyang will be able to hold the bandits until reinforcements arrive. The bandits number about one thousand, of whom one-half are mounted. It is not now believed that they will make exorbitant demands for the release of the captives.

The Chinese Government has offered liberal rewards for the rescue of the missionaries, and has instructed the officials to do everything possible to secure their release and to protect the envoys who have gone to negotiate with the bandits. Our legation at Peking reports to the State Department that the captives are the Rev. and Mrs. Holm, their son and a Miss Sather, of the Lutheran Brethren Mission. Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Fauske and their son, the Rev. Mr. Verdahl, and Miss Rasmussen (who are not Americans) are also believed to be among the captives. The Fauske child is the one reported to have been killed.

Our legation officials at Peking and the American consulate general at Hankow are urging the Chinese authorities to rescue the captives at all cost.

THE LONG DROUGHT IN KANSAS

SEVERAL weeks ago we received letters from readers of this journal in Kansas, giving reports of serious crop conditions in that State owing to long-continued drought. Some of these letters seemed to imply the existence of human suffering in certain districts to an extent that might justify relief work. With the view of investigating the actual situation, we wrote to a number of CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers in different parts of the State, inquiring as to the extent and duration of the drought, present crop conditions, condition of live-stock, and as to the existence of distress among the farmers and in rural communities generally. It is gratifying to know from most reliable sources that, while the drought has unquestionably done great damage both to crops and cattle, there is no indication of suffering among the people themselves, save in a few isolated cases. For the information of our readers generally, we have tabulated the results of our investigation below:

Some of the letters tell how severely the farmers have been suffering during the long drought. A letter from Hutchinson says: "We have had no rain for months; pastures have been all burned up; trees are dying all around us; No. 2 corn is ruined; I have seen scores of fields burned up—an awful sight to see!"

A minister writes from Fort Scott: "No doubt there will be much suffering in parts of the State this coming winter, should it be a severe one; but I think there is no doubt that the State can take care of herself."

Another minister writes from Lawrence: "Kansas is a big State, and conditions are often 'spotted.' I have seen a good crop on one side of the road and a failure on the other side, just because a shower which saved one field stopped at the road."

Another writer from the same city says: "A great many are selling sheep, and in some cases giving away their stock because they haven't water. Wells have failed and a good many haul water for miles for their stock. Trees are dying, and fruit has been badly injured."

A Topeka pastor writes: "In our county (Shawnee) only about half an inch of rain has fallen since May 15. Since May 27, the thermometer has hung about 100 degrees and part of the time around 108 and 100. A great many of the rivers and smaller streams are dried up; wells have gone dry and stock is famishing for water. Corn is almost a total failure."

From Wamego, Pottawatomie County, a pastor writes: "Even if the conditions were worse than have been described, our people are both able and willing to care for the needy ones in the drought-stricken districts of the State. I do not believe there will be need of charitable aid from outside."

From Inman another pastor writes: "Kansas is truly suffering as never before, due to the incessant drought . . . but I cannot see the necessity for relief work, for, as far as I know, no human being or animal has had to suffer to any appreciable extent. A crop specialist in Topeka estimates that the Kansas corn crop has suffered exceedingly, and probably will not exceed 50,000,000 bushels."

Kansas is, however, a very large State, extending 400 miles from east to west, so that a variation of weather conditions is not surprising in so vast a territory. A correspondent in Leavenworth writes that in his section the water supply is not exhausted, and that there is no suffering except from heat, although the continued drought spoils the chances of fall crops. Immediately west of there, however, there was real suffering from lack of water.

From Atchison a correspondent writes: "In this county wheat and oats were excellent crops. But fifty miles west, many farmers have nothing. I was told the water was selling at five cents a glass in the stores of Holton, Jackson County. In Butler County a farmer said that farmers were hauling water from the creeks for their stock night and day, and often had to go a distance of eight or ten miles."

A pastor in Wichita writes that while conditions are bad, they are not as serious as have been represented in some quarters. Corn has almost been an entire failure, yet the farmers, where they have silos, have saved the fodder. In the eastern half of the State pasturage and prairie hay are very scarce. Hay will be worth twenty dollars a ton. Wheat is about a three-fifths yield, and as corn is so very high, some farmers are feeding wheat to their stock.

We desire to express our thanks to those friends who have placed at our disposal such complete and timely information. Kansas is passing through a severe trial, and we trust that the coming winter may not be one of still greater hardship. Should relief work at any time become desirable and acceptable, there are many thousands of generous-hearted and sympathetic Americans who, remembering the liberal-heartedness of Kansas toward others, would quickly come to the rescue. We pray that it may never be needed.

General Notes

—AT THE ANNUAL MEETING of the board of trustees of the Bowery Mission held in New York on September 30, Rev. John Hallimond, superintendent of the mission, was elected as a trustee, and was also chosen as president of the board, to succeed the late Dr. Charles H. Mead.

—A MEMORIAL FUND of $25,000 in honor of the late Rev. Dr. Charles H. Mead is being raised by the National Temperance Society, the object being to apply the income to the furtherance of temperance principles. Dr. Mead was an ardent temperance advocate and a leading officer of the national society for many years. For several years prior to his death he was president of the Bowery Mission. Any readers interested in the memorial may address Dr. J. W. Cummings, secretary of the National Temperance Committee, 373 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

—A READER OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in Newburg, Ind., writes us regarding a statement made in an article on church union in our issue of September 17. Our correspondent takes issue with the statement there made that two-thirds of the membership of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church oppose union with the Presbyterian North. He says: "Of the 160,000 Cumberland Presbyterians, 120,000 favored the union. Some withdrew at a later date, but just as many reversed their decisions in the opposite way. There could have been no legal union with two-thirds opposing it, but all the State supreme courts have sustained the union as legal except those of Tennessee and Missouri. Only a few weeks ago the Federal courts in these States sustained the union."

FROM A MAN'S POINT OF VIEW

I PRESUME you like to know how THE CHRISTIAN HERALD appeals to its readers. From the standpoint of a man who likes to keep informed on the leading news items of the day, I would like to tell you that before you added the page headed "A Week in the World's News" I had to take another periodical to keep informed. Since you have added that page THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is an ideal paper in every respect. I shall discontinue the other periodical. V. L. S.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS

*A SERMON BY BISHOP LUTHER B. WILSON, D.D., LL.D.

TEXT: "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith."
Heb. 12: 1, 2

IN THE Epistle to the Hebrews, the twelfth chapter and the first two verses, these words are written. Now, the Word to which I desire to invite your thought is in the second verse: "Looking unto Jesus." It is a wonderful chapter that, just preceding this twelfth. It is a chapter in which this inspired artist sets before us many of the mighty ones of the olden days, presenting in bold strokes their moral lineaments; suggesting unto us in perfect and accurate touches of his thought the characteristics of these saints and heroes. And in the beginning of this twelfth chapter he recalls to us what has been before our minds: that we are compassed about with a great cloud of witnesses, tier rising upon tier; witnesses seen, witnesses invisible; and he urges us that as we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses —those who have witnessed to their own faith in Christ; their faith in the great God in the olden days, and who, in a sense that perhaps we do not always appreciate, are witnesses also of our actions—"seeing that we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses," he urges us to take up the tasks of life; address ourselves to the things which God sets before us for the doing, so that "laying aside every weight," we may "run with patience the race that is set before us."

If Jesus Were Here

And if there were nothing more in this Word than such an exaltation as that, it would be quite worth our while to tarry in the presence of it, for those whose characters have been delineated in these chapters represent the toilers in almost every field of human action. They represent the dreamers whose dreams have come true; they represent the seers who have looked out upon the broad circle of God's purpose; they represent the priests who have made sacrifices for men, and who have, many of them, made for men the sacrifice of themselves. They represent the quiet toilers and those who, in the presence of the uneasy and tempestuous world, have wrought well; and if you were privileged only to gaze upon these characters of the long ago, you ought to be the better for it; you ought to go down to your place the better qualified for the task and the trial that there await you. But this writer does not stop there. He urges us to get out of that vision of the life heroic all that it is possible for us to derive of inspiration and faith and patience from the sight of those characters. But then, just as again and again in this Epistle he has turned his thought toward the great Prophet of Nazareth, the divine Son, so he turns his thought again to the divine Son, and he says that we are to "run with patience the race that is set before us," and that we are to run this race "looking unto Jesus."

Now, in a very simple way, I want to ask your thought to this expression of the inspired writer this morning. You and I are going up to the tasks of life. It has seemed to many of us that we have been upon some mount of privilege here. If there had been nothing but the privilege of meeting with the saints in God, that in itself were an exalted privilege. If any old truth has appeared to us in a new setting; if out of the storehouse of God any new treasure has come for our enrichment, then we ought to be glad in God, and we ought to go back to our task mindful of the privilege and the opportunity. But if we shall go back feeling to do that which this writer in the Word which I bring to you this morning urges you to do, it is not unlikely that life shall be to us as the unfolding of some delightful dream. You have had difficulties; you have had fears, and you have had your defeats in life. If to-morrow is to be better than yesterday, we are to "run with patience the race that is set before us"; and I want that we shall think of this vision of our Lord as setting for us the great standards of life—"looking unto Jesus."

Sometimes you have said, "I wonder what Jesus would do if Jesus were to come to some of the little towns here; if Jesus were to come to some of the great cities to-day as he used to come to those cities a long time ago, in the land that we call the Holy Land because he came there. I wonder what ever Jesus would think of men? I wonder what Jesus would think of us if Jesus were to come into our homes and look at the pictures on the wall; if he were to come and see the bits of art that we have in the parlor; if he were to see the library from which we take the books upon which so many times we concentrate our thought; I wonder what Jesus would think? I wonder what Jesus would say if he came to our towns; if he came to our great cities and studied the problem of our political chicanery?"

What Would He Have Us Say?

I wonder what he would say if there were unfolded before him the intrigue and corruption that is not a closed book to you and me? What do you think he would say if he should come into the exchanges of the world; if he should visit our shops, our offices, our counting rooms? If we should turn over to him our books and should unfold before him the purposes that we are cherishing in our minds, I wonder what Jesus would have to say? I wonder what Jesus would say if, on next Sabbath day, when you and I go back to the place accustomed and sit down with our fellow believers in the church at home—if our Lord could walk into the Sunday school and hear what is taught to those that gather there; if he sat where we shall sit, perhaps, to hear the sermon; if he listened to the singing of the choir; if he mingled with those that gather together at the close of the service to talk it all over —I wonder what our Lord would say in that home church? What would he miss, what would he find there that ought not to be there? If he walked our streets, I wonder what our Lord would think of life in the twentieth century; I wonder what our Lord would have to say of us in Christian America in the twentieth century—I wonder what our Lord would have to say?

But you and I are to remember that it is not a dream, after all. It is not a question of what Jesus Christ would think if he came to our town, because he does come to our town. It is not a question of what our Lord would think if he entered into our homes, for he has entered into our homes, and he sees what is there, and he knows what is written under the cover of every book, and he knows the subtle influence of every picture that hangs upon the wall. It is not a question of what he would see if he came to our shop, our counting-room, or our office. He has been there again and again. He comes there day after day. You do not have to put your books before him as you set your books before the bank examiner. He opens them himself, and he sees whether the commercial standard of the age is in accordance with his own divine purpose, or whether the commercial practice of to-day is only an evidence of savage commercialism. He knows all about it. He does walk our streets.

The Standard of Jesus for America

Here in this twentieth century he is walking our streets, he is looking upon those who jostle one another on the way. He takes account of the moralities of life in the things that perhaps do not always impress us with moral significance. He does walk our streets; he does understand the subtle influences that pervade society. He watches while ever the lights flare and flicker; he watches. He is present behind the closed doors, and he is present when the multitude is gathered together. Oh, if Jesus, your Master and Lord, if Jesus, the fairest among the fair, and the purest among the pure, walks the streets of the village and of the town and of the city—oh, men and women of America, I plead with you that what he shall see upon the streets of our cities in Christian America shall not make him sorry that America is called a Christian nation!

Men of America, I plead with you! Women of America, I plead with you that by your example and by your patience and by your earnest work you shall strive to lift up all the standards of virtue and of morality until the streets of our great cities shall be entirely safe places for manhood and womanhood and childhood to walk upon; and until Christian America shall represent not in its only but in its high ethical standards the character of Him whose name we are so proud to bear. Men and women of Christian America, Jesus Christ is walking in the streets, and wherever there is an influence pernicious, demoralizing; wherever there is a subtle influence that menaces society with corruption; wherever there is a custom that tends to lessen modesty and grace and substitute for modesty that which is immodest; wherever there is aught of offense against one of God's little ones, you are to remember that the standards are to be pushed up and up and up; no sagging in the standards. Christian America, if America be really Christian, then America must represent still the Pilgrim and the Puritan. America must still represent the Word of God; America must represent that old-fashioned method of life when virtue and faith and conscience and love were everything.

The Presence of Jesus

Looking unto Jesus—and Jesus is in that church. He was there; he is there to-day; he will be there next Lord's Day; he will be there to hear what the Sunday school teachers are saying in their classes; he will be there to hear what the preacher is saying in his sermon; he will be there to hear what is the subject of conversation when the service is over; he will be there to hear it all. When we go back to the old home shall we remember? shall we be looking into his face to ask him whether what he sees and what he hears is really pleasing unto him?

Looking unto Jesus. Many of you here this morning are pillars of the church to which you belong. There are men and women here this morning who, if they are not ministers of the Gospel, are determining the character of the girls and the boys under their care. I beg of you let us go back to the old place, look into his face, and ask him to help us do only those things that are pleasing to him. If it were possible to bring some of the great masters of art, music, and literature to help lift up our standards, we should accept their judgment and it would be of advantage to us. I pray you get the judgment of Jesus concerning them. Look unto him! Look unto him and hear what he has to say. Look unto him, and discover what he thinks of the things that enter into your life, and according to his judgment, so let your purpose be.

A mother, while visiting her son, who was a sophomore in one of the great institutions of learning, noticed upon the walls of his study pictures of such character as he had not been accustomed to see hanging upon the walls of his home. On returning home, she mailed to her son a picture of the Christ. But when he hung the picture of the Christ upon the wall, then the incongruity of the setting of the picture became apparent to him. Then, by-and-by, when the mother came again into the study of her son, lo, the face of Christ hanging there upon the wall of her boy's study, determined the character of all the other pictures that were hung upon the wall. Oh, brother, sister, it is a great thing to hang the picture of your Lord in the dining-room and the parlor. It is a great thing, men of business, to hang his picture in the office and counting-room, in the factory and in the shop. It is a great thing to carry the picture of the Christ with you wherever you go, so that all the elements of life shall be in harmony, and all that is incongruous shall disappear.

We are not only to look unto Jesus for the ethical standards of life, but we are to look unto Jesus for the power that shall help us to realize the high standards of life. It is the great purpose of our divine Lord to help us do the thing that we know is right. It is the great purpose of our Lord that we shall keep our eye fixed upon him. The sea may be troubled, and Peter may not have very stout heart; but so long as Peter shall keep his face turned upon our Lord, Peter shall not sink. How is it that the ethical standards of our faith shall be

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, October 26. Isaiah 55. What wonderful transformations are produced by God's grace! There is no wizardry like the ministry of eternal love. "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree." The thorn is a minister of pain, sharp and piercing. The fir is the wood from which was made the framework of the harp and other instruments of music. And so the realm of pain is to be changed into the home of harmony. The painful wail is to be replaced by the melodious chord. "Your sorrow shall be turned into joy."

Thorns into harps! And that is what the gracious Lord is waiting to do if only we will turn from our sins. But in our folly we keep to our sins and lie down upon thorns. "Let the wicked forsake his way," and he will be amazed what heavenly harmonies will break upon his ears, and what sweet ministers will reveal themselves in God's wonderful world. "The mountains and hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands."

MONDAY, October 27. Numbers 22: 2-6. God's doings among a people make that people famous. Moab heard of the exploits of Israel and was sore afraid. When God possesses the church her enemies stagger with fear. When the church is filled with divine life strongholds shake at her approach. But who fears a church that is bereft of her Lord? Who is afraid of swords that are wielded by babes? Who will tremble at the noise of shouts in which there is no "breath divine"? The world laughs when she is confronted by a prayerless church! The world is filled with dismay when in the church she hears "the sound of a rushing mighty wind."

Our emphasis is wrong. We are more concerned with institutionalism than with Christ. We hanker after fine preaching more than after deep communion. We are more keen for splendid music than for the still small voice. We are more concerned with our uniform than with our Commander, with pipeclay than with importunate intercession. And so the church moves, but nobody quakes. Moab is not afraid, for the exploits are missing which tell of the presence of the Lord of Hosts.

TUESDAY, October 28. Numbers 24: 10-19. "What the Lord saith, that will I speak." That is the mood that makes the prophet. There is, first of all, the listening ear, and then the faithful mouth. The true prophet cultivates a sensitive ear for the voice of the Lord. Worldly voices are so loud and urgent that often it requires delicate discernment to perceive the still small voice of God. Listening for the Highest is a noble and ennobling exercise. The ears grow keen with the discipline until at length, even amid tumultuous clamors, one can hear the guiding word. And then, hearing the word, to speak it, precisely as we receive it—that is the ministry of the prophet.

"What the Lord saith, that will I speak;" and nothing else! How many speeches that principle would destroy! And how many sermons! And how many gossiping conversations! If the lips were for the exclusive use of the King, what an abatement there would be in their daily traffic! Daily speech would be as hallowed as sacramental bread. Words would be the sacred and responsible ministers of God, whether they conveyed the light merchandise of wit and humor, or the heavier commerce of indignation and judgment.

WEDNESDAY, October 29. Numbers 22: 20-35. "The angel of the Lord stood in a narrow place." . . . "and his sword drawn in his hand." We are sometimes led by means of blocked roads. There is guidance by the ministry of the closed door. There are angels who go before us with lamps; and there are angels who stand against us with swords. Sometimes, therefore, God's will is revealed to us in obstacles. We cannot make headway; that is not our road. A young girl wishes to become a missionary, but every time she turns herself in that direction the way is closed. Maybe it is the angel with the sword, appointed by a gracious Providence to turn us aside.

Now the opposing angel with the sword is one of God's ministers of love and grace. Barbed wire on the top of a perilous cliff is a real friend. If the barbs were taken away, little children might romp about it, and fall into disaster and death. The sword of the angel is often a better friend than the olive-branch of peace. Nay, if we only knew it, the sword is only a disguised olive-branch. It is love expressing itself in severity, so that we may be saved from transgression and kept from marring the gracious purpose of God.

THURSDAY, October 30. Numbers 23: 1-10. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." It is well to measure things from the standpoint of the last mile-post. How do matters look "in the long run"? A racer may be very successful in the hundred yards and yet be disastrously beaten in the mile. How does worldliness fare "in the long run"? How does the lust for pleasure appear when we reach the stage of three score years and ten? How does avarice look when the shadows of evening are falling, and life's day hastens toward the night? What appearance do things wear in the approach of death?

It is here that the righteous find their radiant witness. The decay of the body does not leave the soul naked and impoverished. As the earthly tent falls away, it reveals a house of God "eternal in the heavens." They may never have tasted worldly success or glory, but "at eventide it is light." They may have lost in the short run, but they gloriously win in the long run. They may have lost a battle, but they win in the campaign. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

FRIDAY, October 31. Numbers 24: 1-9. How gracious and winsome is the picture which Balaam gives of the people who live in the blessing of the Lord! "As gardens by the river's side." My mind wanders to a fair garden, stretched along a river's bank, and filled with every token of beauty and abundance. No withering thirst imperils the loveliness. The roots are kept moist through the fiercest droughts. The influence of the gladsome stream is felt in every bed, and the most delicate sapling scents the presence of its friend. And so it is with the people who know the Lord. Their roots are moistened with unseen gracious influences, their leaf does not wither, and in whatsoever they do they shall prosper.

"As cedars beside the waters." A cedar on the slopes of Lebanon is a magnificent type of strength, but a cedar with all the resources of an unfailing stream is a still more splendid symbol of unconquerable might. Even so is it with the souls that dwell by "the river of water of life." They become cedar-like in their majestic strength. They "do not fear when heat cometh," and they laugh in the assault of the tempest. "We rejoice in all our tribulations!" There's a cedar by the waters! "What can separate us from the love of God?" There, too, are cedars, exulting in the strength of their resources.

SATURDAY, November 1. Luke 16: 13-17. "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." We cannot travel east and west at the same time. We cannot in the same moment clothe appropriately for the Arctic regions and the tropics. We must make our choice, and ignore either the one or the other. We cannot be both refined and vulgar. We cannot be pure and impure. We cannot move horizontally and vertically in the same movement, onward in the companionship of the world, and upward in the companionship of the Lord. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve."

But, after all, we too commonly believe that we can have two masters, and that it is possible to render service to both. We split up our life, and divide our inheritance. We give a portion to Mammon and a portion to God. I have seen a shopkeeper selling his goods on the Sabbath, and paying his respects to the Lord by retaining one shutter on the window! That one-shutter expedient is very common in other concerns besides Sunday trading. A woman lives a worldly life and wears a crucifix. A man makes money as he pleases, but never misses the sacrament. The home never hears the sound of worship, but the family Bible is always on the table by the window. "No man can serve two masters." The Lord demands our all.

lifted? It shall be only as we keep looking unto Jesus; looking unto Jesus. It is not so much more faith that we need, but it is more of Christ that we are needing. It is Christ with us; Christ before us; it is Christ in us that is needed for the accomplishment of the great divine purpose. Not only look unto Jesus for the standards of your life, but I invite you to trust in him; I invite you to surrender unto him; I invite you to receive him as made unto God for righteousness. Looking unto Jesus—Christ with me; Christ in me, then we shall know the blessedness of the life that is alone with God; the life victorious, the life splendid, the life heroic.

Looking unto Jesus: the nearness of that look of faith, the blessedness of that appropriating look, the earnestness of that soul-grasp that will not be satisfied with anything else, and will not be satisfied with any one else can be satisfied only with Jesus. "Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith"; Jesus, the multiplier of the loaves upon the mountainside; Jesus, the quieter of tempestuous seas; Jesus, the resurrection, there beside the little daughter of Jairus. Jesus, standing at the grave of Lazarus, and where it seems as though there could be no recall to life, speaks but the word and Lazarus comes forth from his grave in that rock-hewn sepulcher, and is given back into the arms of those that love him. Christ of the atoning sacrifice; Christ of the Pentecost; Christ of the Easter morning!

There are dangers, there are difficulties, there are besetments. Falsities ofttimes come under the guise of truth; but I want you to take this simple message, and I want you to resolve this morning that whatever happens in this world, so far as you are concerned, there shall be no turning back. Whatever shall happen, whatever the world shall say, whatever shall be the temptation to doubt and disloyalty, as the Captain and the King shall help us there shall be no turning back.

Oh, brother, sister, "seeing that we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses," let us find cleansing for our sin in the blood of the Crucified. Let us find the answer to our need in our divine Lord. Let us keep our face fixed upon him who is the Resurrection and the Life and the mighty power of God, able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think; and keeping our eyes fixed upon Jesus, and seeking his indwelling in our hearts, and receiving at his hand the outpoured gift of the Holy Ghost, "let us run with patience the race that is set before us," until in the kingdom of his glory we shall see him "face to face," and overcoming, we shall share with him the glory and the joy of conquest.

CHAPTER I

IT WAS fifteen years after the First Church in Raymond had adopted the motto, "What Would Jesus Do?"

The pledge, as carried out by the members who had taken it, had revolutionized the church. Henry Maxwell still continued as pastor. Many of the members of the church had been much disturbed by the rule which Mr. Maxwell had introduced into the lives of the members, but a majority had sustained him, and he had continued to grow in the respect and affection of his large and growing congregation and in the respect of the business men and citizens of Raymond.

Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell were talking early one Friday evening about a gathering of old friends who were coming to the parsonage that night. It was the anniversary of the day when the First Church had taken the pledge to try to do as Jesus would do, and following a custom of several years, a dozen or more of the original company that had taken the pledge then were coming in after supper to talk over the old and new phases of their discipleship.

This evening Mr. Maxwell seemed strangely restless. He had gone over the list of those who were expected and had commented on different ones as his wife was asking questions. All the time he was talking, Mr. Maxwell paced back and forth between the large west window of the sitting-room and the library, several times pausing to look with deepening and what seemed awed curiosity out of the window into the waning twilight.

"Will Rollin be able to come to-night?" Mrs. Maxwell had asked.

"I'm afraid not. He has been asked to go to Chicago and advise with the Commercial Club in regard to the social evil and take part in the Eugenics Congress. I think he planned to start this afternoon. But Rachel will come with Virginia."

"Doesn't it seem like a miracle to think of Rollin Page becoming an authority on these great social service questions?" Mrs. Maxwell said after another pause, during which Mr. Maxwell had again stopped to gaze with a look of intense feeling through the big west window.

"It is a miracle. Mary, why should we take for granted that miracles are unnatural or uncommon? Or that they belong to any special age of the world? Why may we not expect miracles in our time? We need them. And Rollin is such a miracle. Nothing but a miraculous influence changed Rollin Page from a careless, selfish, worldly clubman into a devout, earnest, religious lover of men, a new man all over himself, no more like the old Rollin than white is like black."

"Why, of course, if a change in a life like that is really a miracle, we have plenty of evidence that miracles still occur. But we don't generally call that a miracle, do we?"

"But what else can we call it? And did not the Master himself say that his disciples would do even greater works than he himself did? And do you know, Mary, I find myself of late longing, with a feeling I cannot express or explain, for a superhuman vision, for a real manifestation of the divine presence that somehow I cannot avoid feeling will be given to Christian disciples of this age. Oh, I long so for a real actual flesh-and-blood glimpse of Jesus. I feel at times as if I must see him face to face. He said to his disciples, 'I am with you alway, even to the end of the ages.' If he is really in the world why may we not see him, really see him some time? I must see him. My heart cries out for him. I need him. Not necessarily to strengthen my faith, but to give him in person some expression of my love for him. And of late I keep wondering what Jesus would do and say in the world where we live. It is so different from the world in which he lived. I would give anything if I could see him and hear him and ask him questions. And I have wondered so often of late"—Henry Maxwell paused and looked over at his wife with deep thoughtfulness—"wondered if it might be possible somehow for him to live on this earth again. It has been so long since he was here. And the world needs him so much again. It has fought and sinned and suffered and loved and endured all through these centuries, doing wondrous things in his name and for his sake. Common men in one age of the world saw and felt and heard Jesus. Why should it not be possible for common men of another age to have the same glory shine around them? Why should not God give his Son to the world again and refresh its courage and strengthen its faith by a glimpse of him who once came so long ago?"

Mrs. Maxwell was startled by the deep and passionate outburst of her husband. During all the years of their married life and during all his ministry, she had never heard anything like it from him. He had moved along the track of his discipleship apparently satisfied with his devotion to the Master whose example he was trying to imitate. And his wife had not suspected what now found expression.

She rose and came over to him. He had paused again in front of the big window, and together husband and wife stood there, Mrs. Maxwell's hand on his arm, an anxious, troubled look on her face, wondering at the thought that seemed to be troubling her husband. But before she could speak, he had started forward and pointed eagerly out toward the farthest distance.

"There! It is out there again! That strange light! See, Mary, how it fills the sky! It cannot be twilight. It is too late, and we have seen it now for more than a month! What is it?"

Mrs. Maxwell could feel her husband tremble. She was more disturbed at the sight of his unusual agitation than she dared allow him to notice, and she answered quietly:

"We have spoken of it before, and you remember we agreed it might easily be caused in a number of ways. You remember the peculiar light that flooded the sky several years ago when dust was wafted around the world from the volcanic disturbances in the East Indies?"

"But there is something about this wholly unlike that. See, Mary! It is not an earthly light! It has a color and a radiance and a movement all its own. We have never in all our lives seen anything like it."

"You are unduly excited over it," said Mrs. Maxwell, again placing her hand soothingly on her husband's arm. "It cannot be anything but a natural light, caused by some disturbance that we do not understand." But even as she spoke she could not resist an exclamation of wonder as she continued to gaze with her husband out through the window at what they both saw.

The softest, mellowest suffusion of pale blue swept up from the horizon and was met by what seemed an answering wave of deep crimson. And as the two waves mingled, the colors were softly blended into an unspeakably dissolving shade of pure white that could not be compared for one moment with sun or moon or starlight. It pulsated like a wave backward and forward and filled not only the entire expanse of sky but seemed as well to fill up all interspaces of the firmament and fell over the earth like an immeasurable billow of radiance, the glittering spray from which was thrown up against the stars, and then subsided with a majestic slowness that spoke of all the world's accumulated forces somewhere lying latent and unspent, ready at any future time to repeat its glory for the pleasure of those who had the delicacy of spirit to understand it.

Henry Maxwell turned to his wife as the light softly disappeared.

"Mary, do you mean to tell me that such a light as that is caused by volcanic dust or earthquake disturbance? It was the very glory of heaven. It was—what if it really was—the harbinger of His coming to earth again! What if—"

He was so excited and agitated that Mrs. Maxwell felt alarmed as she looked at him.

"It is not possible, Henry. You have allowed your imagination or your longing to get the better of your usual judgment. It is not like you to talk and act like this."

Mrs. Maxwell drew down the shade of the window and Mr. Maxwell made a strong effort to regain his usual calm manner as he walked back into the library and sat down.

"I suppose you are right," he said with a sigh, "but it is a very unusual sight and I cannot account for it. I wonder the papers have not had more to say about it."

"Mr. Norman mentioned it in the News yesterday."

"True. He did. But the Gazette has not had a line. Mary"—Mr. Maxwell started up with a recurrence of his eager excitement, as if a new thought suddenly possessed him—"do you suppose—but no, it is all improbable. But we will ask Virginia and Rachel when they come. And Felicia. She and Stephen will be here. They are visiting Rachel this week. It will seem good to see them. And Alexander Powers and Dr. West. They must have seen the Light! They must have seen it! And the bishop," Maxwell mused, talking to hi "How I wish the bishop were alive—I am su would have seen it. I am sure he would. them all to come early, Mary. And there is one now."

Answering a ring at the door, Mr. Maxwell himself and ushered in Virginia, Rachel, Felicia.

The moment they came in, Mr. Maxwell note look of deep excitement on their faces. Rache the first to speak.

"Have you seen it, Mr. Maxwell?"

"What?"

"The Light!"

"The same that has been in the sky several t lately? The same—"

"But it was more wonderful to-night than before. We all noticed it on our way here."

"All of you?"

"Yes. We all saw it."

"Where is Stephen?"

"He is coming. He stopped to see Dr. West a the typhoid vaccinations at the Rectangle."

"What do you think of the Light?" Mr. Max spoke to both Rachel and Virginia after a pause.

The friends looked at each other very seriou and Virginia said,

"We have never seen anything like it in all lives. There is something so unusual about it feel afraid. It seemed to us as we came here night as if we were being enveloped in fire."

"Yes!" Rachel broke in eagerly, but with a voice. "But did you notice, Virginia, that the p ple we passed did not seem to notice what seen so strange to us?"

"How was that?" Mr. Maxwell leaned forw in his chair and spoke with a noticeable excitem of manner that Rachel and Virginia could not av remarking.

"What was that!"

"Why, it seemed to us, to Virginia and me, as we were enveloped in a most astonishing glory light that must be felt by every one, but we pas very many persons who did not seem to notice a thing unusual."

"Only," Virginia broke in eagerly, "don't you member, Rachel, once in a while some person wou stop and exclaim and point up into the sky?"

"Yes, I remember that."

"Do you know who they were? I mean the p sons who noticed the Light?" Mr. Maxwell aske still leaning forward and speaking with excit interest.

"No, we couldn't see them, could we, Rachel?"

"I thought I heard Martha's voice," replie Rachel.

"Our Martha?" Mrs. Maxwell asked. "Probab it was. She just started a little while ago to t Rectangle Church service. You know they hav their meeting to-night instead of Thursday, an Martha is very faithful since she joined there."

"It was Martha, I am sure," said Virgini eagerly. "We passed her at the corner of Mai and Third, and I remember I was going to stop an speak to her. Mrs. Maxwell, doesn't it seem like miracle to think of Loreen's sister coming to us a she did, only one year after Loreen's death? An to think of Mr. Maxwell baptizing her on the da the Rectangle Church was dedicated! Every tim I look at Martha I see Loreen. Poor Loreen!"

Tears gathered in Virginia Page's eyes. Virgini had changed but little in fifteen years. She wa still unmarried. Beautiful in face and spirit, wit no decrease of her old Christian enthusiasm as th years passed, she still lavished her wealth and her consecrated intelligence on the welfare of the people of Raymond. She had seen the Rectangle completely transformed since that day when Loreen had been struck down in front of the saloon where she had given her life in shielding Virginia, and through all the years that followed, Virginia had passionately and with deepest consecration devoted herself especially to the lives of women and girls in the city. Without a husband and children of her own, Virginia had nevertheless seemed to enter with complete understanding into the problems of the home life and needs of the women of Raymond, and she was known by them as the real source of great reforms in their social and industrial conditions. Rachel and Felicia would laughingly say that Virginia needed only a home of her own to be the most absolutely splendid and perfect woman of the world. Virginia would reply, her face deepening with fine color, that she was happy in helping to make other women have happy homes. It was ragedy of women like Loreen that struck deep- nto her heart, and when Mrs. Maxwell men- ed Martha it brought up again the old vision of een stumbling through the Rectangle that day ginia had brought the girl to her own home and ed her grandmother to leave the house in anger. To think of Martha a member of the Rectangle rch, Mrs. Maxwell! If Loreen could only have l to see it! She told me while she was with after grandmother went, about Martha and the ful experiences she had gone through in the te slave traffic in Chicago. What a miracle! l what a joy to have her here with you of all nen, Mrs. Maxwell!" Again Virginia's eyes d as she impulsively laid her hand on Mrs. Max- 's arm.

You never saw a girl like Martha," Mrs. Max- l replied with deep feeling. "The fearful things t girl suffered in Chicago are past belief. She ured unspeakable things. Twice she tried to herself when she could not escape from the se where she had been imprisoned. But to- she is the most devoted, faithful, enthusiastic ciple of Jesus you ever saw. I think I never saw nore complete love for Christ in any human be- . And when it comes to loving her church, we all l rebuked at the sight of her absolute passion for church. Mr. Grey has taken full charge re, you know, and if he keeps on the way he s begun, it won't be long before the child of First Church will outnumber in membership mother. Martha herself has brought at least enty new members into the communion since joined. And she is the most thoughtful, reful, helpful person about the kitchen I ever ew. All my hired girl problems are solved ice she came to me."

"Yes," said Mr. Maxwell, "all you need to do get Mrs. Maxwell started on the hired girl oblem is to mention Martha. We haven't any ubles since she came into the house."

"It's true," Mrs. Maxwell eagerly assented. hat girl's religious enthusiasm shames me ery day. She headed the subscription at the ectangle with $25. We pay her all we can af- rd, $5 a week, and she dedicated one-tenth of r income to church work. And she believes in sus just as if he were a real person living to- y, and she might possibly meet him around the rner any time."

"And isn't he living to-day?" murmured Mr. axwell. "But where? Where? And why ouldn't he live on the earth again—"

Rachel and Felicia and Virginia looked at him astonishment, and Mrs. Maxwell again laid er hand on his arm as she had before when they ood in front of the window.

The bell rang and Mr. Maxwell, starting up as rom a reverie, went to the door and admitted r. West and Alexander Powers and Stephen lyde.

The moment they entered the room they re- ealed in their faces the same serious look which ad been borne by Rachel, Virginia and Felicia. hey spoke almost together.

"Have you seen it?"

"The Light?" Mr. Maxwell exclaimed, and his oice was instantly echoed by the others.

"It has not been so beautiful nor so enveloping s this evening," said Alexander Powers.

During fifteen years Powers had experienced leep things in his heart and mind. From that ight when the sound of Rachel's voice in the Rectangle had decided his course after the dis- overy of the railway's breaking of law in the ebate cases, Alexander Powers had passed hrough a furnace of trial. Not for one moment ad he turned back from following his Master. But his path had been rough and broken and his cross heavy. Yet the lovelight of the Redeemer shone steadily out of his great patient eyes.

"You all saw it?" asked Maxwell, his old ex- citement rising again.

"Yes, all of us."

"It was astonishing." Dr. West spoke in a subdued voice but with the deepest feeling.

Stephen Clyde had walked over to Felicia. He and Felicia had had a perfect married life. They would always be lovers. Stephen stood now by her while Felicia proudly noted her husband's hand- some strength. Both had given themselves heart and soul to social service in the Master's name.

"Stephen," said Felicia gently, "what do you think of the Light?"

"I don't know. There was something about it to-night that made me strangely both glad and fearful. It filled me with the deepest longing and at the same time my heart beat with something like terror."

"It had the same effect on me. Isn't it strange? What do you suppose—"

The bell rang again, and Mr. Maxwell welcomed into the room President Marsh and Mr. Norman. The moment they came into the room their faces revealed the same excitement borne on the faces of the others who had come in before them.

Edward Norman could hardly speak for emotion. He panted as if he had been running.

"Maxwell—this is a—most astounding thing—this—light. It is absolutely without a parallel. How do—you—account for it? Marsh and I—tried to explain it—as—we came—along. It is not explainable."

"Unless"—Mr. Maxwell's face was deathly pale. His wife looked at him as she had all the evening with the same anxious, troubled look, wondering at an unusual exhibition of feeling on her husband's part—"unless, Norman, it might be—it might be—do you regard it as entirely out of the range of human events that Jesus might live among men again?"

"Henry!" Mrs. Maxwell had come up to him as he stood in the middle of the room. The entire company was hushed into the most profound stillness. "Henry! What an impossibility! It is not—"

"But why? Why?" Mr. Maxwell persisted with a stubborn recurrence to the same thought, and yet he seemed timid about fully expressing it. "I don't know why if one age was permitted an actual sight of Jesus, another age—"

Mrs. Maxwell gently placed her hand on his arm, and, with a short laugh, made him sit down by Mr. Norman. "I think, Mr. Norman," she said, talking directly to him, while her husband unresistingly obeyed her motion, "I think Henry is rather nervous and not just like his usual calm self. He has been working beyond his strength for several months."

"I know he has, Mrs. Maxwell. It's going to be a fine thing for him to have the assistant the church voted last annual meeting. By the way, Maxwell, when does Stanton arrive?"

"Stanton? Oh, why, I had almost forgotten him. This Light— Stanton wrote he might come in to-night. I told him to come right here as soon as he arrived, and he may come in any time. He wrote, asking me not to trouble about meeting him at the station, as he was not certain about the exact time of his arrival."

"I hope he will prove to be the man you need," said Mr. Norman.

"We believe he will," Mrs. Maxwell answered. "We used to know him when he was at the settlement in Chicago. Mr. Maxwell feels confident no mistake has been made."

"About Stanton?" Mr. Maxwell spoke with great enthusiasm. "Stanton is a rare fellow. He is one out of ten thousand. First Church will never regret calling him, and he will be of the greatest possible help to me. He is forty years old, mature in his judgment, and a splendid fellow in every way."

"The only thing I have against him," Mrs. Maxwell said, smiling, "is that he is not married."

As she said it she happened to look toward Virginia, who was eagerly talking to Felicia and Stephen. Mrs. Maxwell seemed on the point of adding a word but did not. Mr. Maxwell simply said: "Oh, well, Stanton will not cause any disturbance that way. He is the most confirmed single man I ever knew who was not at the same time disagreeably stubborn about it. He is passionately in love with the ministry. That is why I am so delighted to welcome him as my helper. And I shouldn't wonder if that were he."

The bell had rung as Mr. Maxwell spoke, and he went hastily to open the door. The company gathered in the library could hear Mr. Maxwell's words of eager greeting, and a very strong, deep voice replying, and the next moment Maxwell ushered in Richard Stanton, his new assistant, who received a very cordial welcome from all the members of the First Church, who had anticipated his coming for several weeks.

Stanton was a big, healthy-looking man, gifted with a rich voice and a most kindly smile, and most people felt friendly to him at sight. He exchanged greetings as he shook hands, and when he had completed the circle around which Mr. Maxwell had led him, he found himself by Virginia.

"Miss Page? Oh, I had the great pleasure of meeting your brother at the Congress in Chicago. He made a splendid address at the opening."

Virginia was greatly pleased. "Rollin is splendid. We—I—are so proud of him."

Mr. Stanton was silent, but he seemed to be under some deep feeling, and as the others had begun to talk about various matters, he suddenly said to Virginia: "Miss Page, I had the most remarkable experience as I came along up here from the station. I sent my baggage up to the hotel, as Mr. Maxwell had directed me to do if I reported here at the parsonage, and I walked up here. On the way a most astonishing gleam of light shot up across the sky and seemed to open and shut like a great white blossom. I wonder if you or any others have seen anything like it to-night."

Mr. Maxwell was near enough to hear a part of what Stanton said. He turned about eagerly, just as Virginia turned to him, and exclaimed:

"Mr. Maxwell, Mr. Stanton says he saw the Light as he came along. Can you describe it, Mr. Stanton?"

"No, I have never seen anything with which to compare it. I said it looked to me like a magnificent blossom, spreading out the softest, whitest petals in a breadth and beauty I have never imagined possible. It was not like the aurora borealis, and I have seen that in its glory at the North while with Missionary Landis at Hudson's Bay. I can't describe my feelings at the sight. I was awed, and at the same time I was strangely excited. I have never had such a feeling in all my life."

Stanton's voice was remarkably deep, resonant, pleasantly penetrating, and without meaning to address any one but Virginia and Maxwell, before he had finished speaking every other person in the room had stopped talking and turned to listen.

Mr. Maxwell leaned forward and laid a trembling hand on his new assistant's arm.

"Did you notice other people and the effect of the Light on them?"

"That was one of the most bewildering things about it to me. I was so excited by what I saw that I could not help exclaiming to a man I met, 'Isn't that great!' "

" 'What?' he said, looking at me curiously.

" 'That Light,' I said to him, pointing up at it.

"He looked up and replied, 'I don't see anything,' and passed along." Virginia and Rachel and Felicia looked at one another. Stanton continued:

"Have you people seen anything like this that I do not know how to describe?"

"We have all seen it," replied Mr. Maxwell. And at that a silence fell over the company, a silence which no one seemed to wish to break.

Stanton looked gravely from one to another. The silence deepened. Out on the street the noises of the city could be heard, people passing on the sidewalk, the rumble of the street cars, the passing of carriages and automobiles. It seemed to the little company in the room that something out in the great world was portending, that they stood on the threshold of stupendous movements, but all undefined and shadowy, without a hint yet of what was to be, except as their troubled and excited hearts spoke of bewildering events such as had not occurred to mortals for centuries.

A door opened into the dining-room. Some one walked, almost ran, through the room, and Martha stood at the library opening. As long as life

THE STEAMER VOLTURNO, LOST AT SEA, ON WHICH ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SIX PERSONS PERISHED

MEMORIES of the loss of the Titanic were vividly recalled when, on Saturday, October 11, the news came of another great disaster of the sea. The steamship Volturno of the Uranium line, bound from Rotterdam to Halifax and New York, caught fire in mid-Atlantic on Thursday, causing the loss of 136 lives of her total of 657. The first news of the disaster reached Fishguard from the Cunard liner Carmania. This despatch stated briefly that the Volturno had been abandoned on account of fire on October 10, and that all the survivors had been taken off. It was not until late that night that the details of the disaster were learned. In the later despatches Walter Trintepohl, a German passenger who leaped from the Volturno, and after swimming to the Carmania was rescued in a drowning condition, gave the first concise outline of the tragedy.

On Thursday morning about six o'clock, he said, while a storm was raging, all on board the Volturno were aroused by the fire alarm and ordered on deck. There had been an explosion in the hold and fire had broken out. Life-belts were passed around, and passengers were told that the fire might soon be subdued, but the captain deemed it wise to put on the life-belts. The children cried bitterly and there was much excitement among the women. The fire grew worse and flames could be seen in the hold. At ten A.M. there was a loud demand to lower boats. Captain Inch and his officers behaved splendidly, Mr. Trintepohl said, but the crew was demoralized. Passengers and sailors rushed about wildly, and the latter made no effort to quell the panic. Meanwhile the storm had increased and the waves were mountainous. When the boats were launched, the chief officer took charge of the first one, and tried hard to get the women and children in first, but only partially succeeded. Most of those who entered the boat were members of the crew. It was dashed against the ship's side by the heavy seas and broke in two, and all were drowned. A second boat, which contained more women and children, was similarly jammed and crushed against the ship's side, and all its occupants perished. Three other boats were put out, one of which contained the fourth officer. These boats, as Trintepohl declares, shared he same fate as the first two. Captain Inch then ordered h tackle of the other boats cut to prevent their use.

CAPTAIN FRANCIS INCH of the Wrecked Volturno

By this time the fire had spread below to an extent a drove out the firemen and made it impossible to work h engines. Several hours later the boilers exploded. It a trying time, but the captain, with drawn revolver, pt the crew and firemen in order. All were overjoyed whe Carmania came in sight, the first of the relief fleet to ap in response to the "S. O. S." call. One hundred and lives had been lost before the first of the rescuing steam arrived. Women on the Volturno wept, shrieked, laug and became hysterical. All were huddled on the after d having been driven there by the fire. Rafts were sent by the Carmania, but nobody on the Volturno attempte jump to them, and probably few knew what they were Other steamers were now on the scene, including the G man liner Kroonland, Grosser Kurfuerst and Seydlitz, French liner Touraine, the Russian-American liner C and the steamers Minneapolis, Rappahannock, Narragansett and Devonian. These ten steamships did magnifi work in saving life. Although the storm was unabat they surrounded the Volturno, the Carmania moving ab and using her huge bulk as a wind shield to facilitate th efforts at rescue, while the Narragansett poured la quantities of oil on the troubled sea. The waves were high to permit the use of small boats, but rafts and l belts and life-lines were used in picking up survivors.

Thursday night the great gale moderated and the grew calmer, and before daylight Friday the rescue fl sent out a number of small boats. Hour after hour lifesaving work went on watched by thousands on the res ing fleet, who prayed while the seamen worked. An earn and fervent prayer-meeting was held on the Carmania. Present reports in cate that none were lost but those who attempted to leave in the lifebo Each of the relief ships took up a number of the rescued, 521 in all being sav It is claimed that the Volturno was fully equipped with lifeboats and oth necessary protective apparatus.

THE PRESIDENT SIGNS THE TARIFF BILL

AT ONE minute past twelve on the morning of October 5 the new tariff bill, which has taken so long to enact, became a law and went into effect. President Wilson had stated that he would sign the bill immediately upon receiving it. But when the occasion really came he explained to the crowd of interested spectators that in accordance with the advice of Attorney General McReynolds he would postpone his signature until after nine o'clock, as it would then not break into the operations of the business day anywhere throughout the United States.

The occasion of the signing of the measure was marked by considerable ceremony. There were about fifty persons present in the presidential office when the name and time of the approval were placed upon the bill. In attaching his signature the President used two gold pens, one of which he presented to Representative Underwood, the father of the tariff measure, and the other to Senator Simmons, who engineered the bill through the Senate.

At the time fixed by the President for the ceremonial signing those who had been invited to witness the event were ushered from Secretary Tumulty's office into the oval room in the executive offices which the President occupies while attending to public business. In a few minutes President Wilson came into the room and began chatting with some of the public men who were there. In a short time he walked over to his desk, while behind him the members of the cabinet and the men who had most to do with the enactment of the tariff legislation ranged themselves.

As the President took his place the hum of conversation died down, and the president smilingly explained his reason for deferring the placing of his signature. "I understand," he said, "that it is now after five o'clock in San Francisco, and I presume the ordinary business transactions of the day have been closed."

Then the President smiled again as he said: "I'm not going to say what I think about this bill until after I have signed it."

"You might change your mind," came from some one in the crowd.

"Well, I'm not going to take any chances," responded the President. "The bill might get away from me."

Then the President sat down at his desk and took up one or two gold penholders that he had purchased for the occasion. Looking around at the crowd he remarked:

"I am going to sign this bill with two pens, and give one to Mr. Underwood and one to Senator Simmons," and, after a slight pause, he added:

"And I am also going to mark the time on it."

Taking his watch from his waistcoat pocket, the President glanced at it quickly and, after replacing it, began writing the indorsement that made the new tariff bill the law of the land. With one pen he wrote "Approved," and the date and hour, and the name "Woodrow." Then he took up the other pen and wrote "Wilson."

After the bill was signed President Wilson made a speech which lasted about nine minutes: "Gentlemen," he said in the course of the remarks, "I feel a very peculiar pleasure in what I have just done by way of taking part in the completion of a great piece of business. It is a pleasure which is very hard to express in words which are adequate to express the feeling, because the feeling that I have is that we have done the rank and file of the people of this country a great service. It is hard to speak of these things without seeming to go off into campaign eloquence, but that is not my feelin It is one very profound, a feeling of profound gra tude that, working with the splendid men who ha carried this thing through with studious attenti and doing justice all round, I should have had pa in serving the people of this country as we have be striving to serve them ever since I can remember.

"I have had the accomplishment of something li this at heart ever since I was a boy and I know m standing around me who can say the same thing who have been waiting to see the things done whi it was necessary to do in order to do justice to t United States. And so it is a solemn moment th brings such business to a conclusion, and I hope will not be thought to be demanding too much myself or of my colleagues when I say that thi great as it is, is the accomplishment of only ha the journey. We have set the business of th country free from those conditions which have ma monopoly not only possible, but, in a sense, easy an natural.

"But there is no use of taking away the condition of monopoly if we do not take away also the pow to create monopoly; and that is a financial, rathe than a merely circumstantial and economic power The power to control and guide and direct th credits of the country is the power to say who sha and who shall not build up the industries of th country, in which direction they shall be built, an in which direction they shall not be built.

"We are now about to take the second step, which will be the final step in setting the business of thi country free. That is what we shall do in the cur rency bill, which the House has already passed, an which I have the utmost confidence the Senate wil pass much sooner than some pessimistic individ uals believe."

Rebels Execute Captives

A DESPATCH from Laredo, Texas, states that, according to information received there from what are considered thoroughly trustworthy sources in Mexico, the Mexican federal general Alvarez and one hundred and twenty-five of his officers and soldiers were executed on October 7 at Torreon. No official details of this event have come as yet, but it is stated the executions were carried out under the orders of General Francisco Villa of the Constitutionalist forces. With the city of Torreon, the rebels captured virtually all federal arms and artillery. The battle lasted four days, with heavy losses to both sides.

Barring the Product of Slaughter

WOMEN who arrive in this country from Europe wearing or bringing hats trimmed with the aigrettes of the osprey, the heron, or other wild fowl, must remove those plumes and turn them over to customs officers for confiscation. The secretary of the Treasury has decided that the new tariff law provision, forbidding the importation of aigrettes made from the feathers of wild birds, applies to every such hat decoration and not merely to importations in quantities for sale.

The announcement of this decision was made by Secretary McAdoo on October 8, and came as a good deal of a surprise to those who had laughed at the law that left such an easy chance for its evasion. The secretary announced that the law will be politely but none the less rigidly enforced.

Arbitrating the Railway Dispute

THE government board of arbitration of the dispute between the trainmen and the owners of the Eastern railroads has been in session for a number of weeks at the Hotel Manhattan, New York. Hon. Seth Low is the chairman of the board. The engineers, conductors, and brakemen of these roads are demanding an increase which will bring their wages nearer to the schedule prevailing in the West and South. Much of the testimony taken was technical and intricate, but a number of interesting and significant facts were brought to light. One of the chief claims of the workmen is that the larger freight cars and greater length of train makes their work more difficult and has been accompanied by no increase of pay. There is also objection to "double header" trains. The figures of overtime pay were also considered. As to risks of railroad work, witnesses for the men declared that on the railroads of the United States an employee is killed or disabled for life every seven hours and fifteen minutes, and a man injured every nine minutes. These figures were disputed by the representatives of the railroad owners. The system of interlocking boards was condemned by the employees. One of their witnesses, Dr. Frank J. Warne, a statistical expert, stated that thirteen directors of the New York Central occupied eighty-nine separate and distinct directorships in subsidiary companies of this road alone. One man was shown to control $10,000,000 worth of stock, or 100,000 votes in the roads now being petitioned. Dr. Warne, in his testimony, also showed that the revenues of these roads have grown from $193,000,000 in 1900 to $373,000,000 in 1911; freight revenues from $472,000,000 to $846,000,000. A. B. Garretson, president of the Order of Railway Conductors, asked whether, with traffic and earnings twice and three times what they were a few years ago, with heavier and longer trains, and with the cost of living increased 60 per cent., the men should not get more, in view of their greater productivity.

To Risk Civil War in Ireland

THE agitation in Great Britain on the subject of Home Rule for Ireland has continued unabated for several months. Ulster County, which is the stronghold of Orange Protestantism in Ireland, has gone so far as to start drilling volunteer troops for active resistance against the enforcement of the Home Rule Bill upon its passage by Parliament. That the Liberal Party, now in power, is fully decided to pass the bill and take the risk was made plain by a speech delivered by the Home Secretary of England, Mr. Reginald McKenna, on October 6. He said: "The Liberal party have convictions and have the courage of their convictions. One of those convictions is that in the government of the country the will of the majority lawfully expressed through their representatives must prevail, and upon that conviction the Liberal party will stand. There is, indeed, no possible alternative. We are not going to submit either to rule by minority or to anarchy. The Home Rule Bill will pass next session through the House of Commons, by authority of the representatives of the people, and if again rejected by the Lords it will pass under the Parliament act." This shows that there are to be no Parliamentary conferences, and that Sir Edward Carson, the Ulster leader, is to be defied.

America's Northmost City Stormswept

ON OCTOBER 6 a tidal storm swept in upon Nome, Alaska, and destroyed one-half of the city. The damage is estimated at upward of $1,000,000, and five hundred persons were made homeless. Nome was built on a sandy strip almost on the very sea beach, and a large part of the city was devastated by the storm and the fire that followed it. The storm that beat in from Bering Sea on the night of October 5 was the worst the city of Nome has ever experienced. The south side of the city was completely inundated. Men and women worked all night in the icy waters to save their household effects. The electric light plant was wrecked and telephone service was disorganized. Large quantities of supplies for the coming winter were lost, including all the meat, except the small quantities in a few retail butcher shops.

Two steamships, the Victoria and the Corwin, ran from the Nome anchorage to the open sea and so escaped damage. Practically all the other boats on the beach were destroyed, among them being four power schooners and five tugs. Two large gold dredges also were destroyed. By wireless the government immediately notified the revenue cutter Bear, which put into Nome, and is bringing 150 passengers, all she can carry, to Seattle. Other steamships which weathered the gale are bringing passengers from the stricken city. A late report says there is no danger of famine, as there are some foodstuffs left, and reindeer, representing 750 tons of meat, are within driving distance.

The Episcopalians in Convention

THE General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church opened at New York on the morning of October 8, with a service in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. The House of Bishops met in the afternoon and elected Bishop Boyd Vincent, of Southern Ohio, as its presiding officer. The House of Deputies met in the new Synod Hall, and elected as president the Rev. Alexander Mann, D.D., of Trinity Church, Boston. This was considered a victory by the "Low Church" party. The most important question which was expected to come before the convention was that relating to a change of name. Some members of the "High Church" party favor the omission of the word "Protestant" from the present name; other members favor the adoption of the term, "The American Catholic Church." Other items of importance to be considered by the convention were the election of a colored bishop to care for the communicants of the negro race, and the report of the work accomplished looking toward church unity in connection with the coming world's conference on faith and order. During the convention the five hundred women delegates, representing the Woman's Auxiliary, held their sessions in St. Michael's Church.

Yuan Shi Kai Becomes President of China

ON OCTOBER 6, Provisional President Yuan Shi Kai was elected president of the Chinese republic for a term of five years, by a majority of two-thirds of the members of the two houses of the Chinese parliament, in joint assembly, in Peking. Of the 850 members of the house of representatives and senate, 759 were in attendance. Three ballots were necessary before a definite decision was obtained, as there were more than twenty candidates. Most of these, however, including Dr. Sun Yat Sen and Dr. Wu Ting Fang, were eliminated on the first ballot. The announcement of the result was received with the greatest enthusiasm. The notes from the Powers recognizing the Chinese republic were despatched to the Chinese foreign office as soon as it had notified the legations of the election of Yuan Shi Kai to the presidency.

Yuan Shi Kai is fifty-four years old. He was born in the province of Honan in 1859. During most of his adult life he has been an official. He took a prominent part in the reorganization of the Chinese army on modern lines, and in the closing years of the empire became one of the most influential and powerful statesmen. He was regarded as the strongest man in China. He was always thoroughly practical in his methods of administration, and by this means worked his way up to the premiership in 1911. Early in 1912 it was he who was given full powers to arrange the terms of abdication of the throne and to organize a republican government in conference with the republican leaders. Shortly afterward, in February, he was elected provisional president of the republic by the national council at Nanking.

Proving the High Cost of Living

A BULLETIN issued by the Bureau of Labor Statistics at Washington early in October has confirmed the contention that there have been tremendous increases in the cost of staple foods during the last two decades. From 1890 to June 15, 1913, the percentage of increase on fourteen of the staple commodities of every man's home ranged from 18 per cent. on flour to 132 per cent. on bacon. Sugar was 35 per cent. higher in 1890 than in 1913. The increase was as follows:

	Per cent.		Per cent.
Sirloin steak	86	Hens	74
Round steak	105	Flour	18
Rib roast	97	Cornmeal	56
Pork chops	115	Eggs	40
Bacon	132	Butter	42
Ham	86	Potatoes	35
Lard	78	Milk	33

There has been considerable variation in the last year. The retail price for fifteen of the principal articles of food was slightly lower on June 15 than on May 15, but the increase for meats, eggs and potatoes was so marked that the average of prices as a whole advanced. The increase in the month was 1.3 per cent. The articles which advanced were sirloin steak, round steak, rib roast, bacon, ham, flour, cornmeal, eggs, and potatoes. Pork chops, lard, hens, butter, sugar and milk declined. A comparison of the prices of June 15, 1913, with those of June 15, 1912, shows that eleven articles advanced and four declined. Potatoes, sugar, flour and cornmeal were lower, the changes ranging from 3.9 per cent. upward. The other articles increased at a percentage ranging from 4.1 on milk to 16.2 on bacon. Round steak, pork chops, bacon, ham, hens and eggs increased over 10 per cent.

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

Our Anniversary Greeting

ON ITS thirty-fifth anniversary THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives cordial greeting to its readers throughout the globe. It is a pleasing retrospect to look across the years and to realize that the little group which formed the nucleus of our Family Circle in 1878 has become a great multitude. Recalling the audience of those early days and contrasting it with the present, we might truthfully borrow the language of Wesley, and say of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of to-day, "The world is its parish."

They have been fruitful years in many ways, material as well as spiritual—years of development in the things that make for human progress. What our fathers knew in embryo we now have in a more perfect form. Our great steamships, lightning-like railways, multiplied means of communication, and wonder-working presses, have united with the Christian spirit of the age in opening up the dark places of the earth to the light of the Gospel. And our own land has been marching ahead during those years. It has doubled in population. The Christian Church has made marvelous progress in all its denominations.

In this generation of phenomenal growth in all things, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has expanded in sympathy with the enlarged opportunities. Every season has brought to it a wider welcome in American homes, until now its readers are numbered by the hundreds of thousands. They have shared in its many Gospel enterprises, and have had a part in its far-reaching campaign of benevolences. They have sent embassies of Christian helpfulness and cheer to the distressed, and their timely generosity has been owned of God in the saving of multitudes who, but for their aid, would have perished. They have comforted the sick, fed the hungry, clothed the naked, sheltered the orphan, cherished the friendless and the outcast and gladdened the hearts of a countless host of the suffering and neglected. We recall these memories with a feeling of sincere gratitude that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been so used for the glory of God and the benefit of humanity, and that it is still being used in the same beneficent service.

Many of those who began with us have passed beyond to their eternal reward, and we hold them in tender remembrance; but there is still with us a goodly number of the "Old Guard," who have stood loyally with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in all its campaigns from the beginning. The thought of these grand Christian veterans is very dear to us. Their kindly letters assure us that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD holds a warm place in their hearts, and has brought them rich blessing throughout the years.

It was the genius of that zealous servant of God, Dr. Louis Klopsch, which gave to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD its first impulse in public favor as a religious weekly journal. We who were associated with him from the outset recall how he took "Faith in God and Christian Service" as his motto, and the old Gospel as the platform of the paper. Under his hands it grew amazingly. Since it was first established, a long procession of publications has come and gone, and the field of denominational journalism has seen many changes. Amid all such vicissitudes, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has kept to its course steady and true, as an interdenominational journal, co-operating with every branch of the great Christian Church.

These thirty-five years have been years of earnest prayer as well as of unremitting effort. We have appreciated to the full the great responsibility of dealing with the spiritual needs of so vast an audience, and we have felt throughout that our own petitions for guidance have been reinforced by the prayers of others. As the circle continued to expand and the responsibilities to grow greater and greater, we felt, at every step of the way, the need of sincere consecration. And so it was that through all the years no work has been undertaken, no enterprise begun, without such consecration. Our readers' co-operation has been to us a tower of strength. They have proved the genuineness of their Christianity in the most practical and conclusive way. Their love of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and their confidence in its management have been prime factors in the success of all our efforts. They have given to the world an example of devoted Christian service which we believe has no parallel.

To the future we look with confidence as inviting us to still larger activities and wider usefulness. With God's blessing and the hearty co-operation of all of its readers, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will continue to grow and be more than ever an active, vital force in spreading the Gospel and in practical Christian effort. Campaigns are to be planned on a still broader scale, and the faith that inspires them will carry them through. Moreover, our faith in reaching the million-mark, which was Dr. Klopsch's dearest wish, is stronger than ever, and we hope that, with the help of all our friends, the day is near when it will be fully realized.

A Nation's Triumph

THOSE able men who planned, the engineers who executed, the skilled and efficient workmen who assisted, and the laborers who toiled in completing the Panama Canal, are to-day the topic of an admiring world, and their triumph is on all lips. It is a triumph in which the whole American nation has a share and of which it may well be proud. Obstacles that seemed insurmountable have been overcome; barriers that baffled earlier attempts have been removed; swamps and morasses have been transformed into living streams and pellucid lakes, and the wedding of the two great oceans is an accomplished fact, lacking only the official announcement. If nature proves kind, the Panama Canal will stand as one of the greatest marvels of triumphant human ingenuity. Rocked by earthquake, yet unharmed and indomitable, it is a monument to man's intrepidity and splendid craftsmanship. To the little group who were at the head of the great enterprise we owe a debt which will be hard to pay. Other nations honor their heroes with decorations and titles. We can only enshrine ours in grateful remembrance, but the fame of Goethals and Gorgas and their comrades will assuredly have a permanent place in our nation's history.

Concerning the Collection

A COLLECTION of $307,500 at one offering makes, we believe, a new record. This great amount was given by the Women's Auxiliary of the Protestant Episcopal Church at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, at New York, on October 9. The collection was reported to be so heavy that it required the combined strength of three clergymen to carry it to the altar after it had been presented by the ushers. The amount was so large that it was impossible to count it in time to announce the total at a mass-meeting at Carnegie Hall of which the most interesting feature was to have been the announcement of the sum contributed in the morning. It was not till late in the evening that the count was complete.

This vast contribution for use in missionary work was made by Episcopal women in addition to their regular offerings for the support of their women missionaries, of whom there are one hundred and fifty on the foreign field, wholly supported by these women of the home church. The offering includes the contributions made for the purpose by the women of each parish and diocese during the three years since the last general convention, and presented by the treasurers of the auxiliaries of each at this triennial service.

This noble gift emphasizes three great facts of Christianity: The power of consecrated womanhood to do great things for Christ's kingdom; the splendor of the Christian grace of giving; and the cry of the heathen hearts for the Gospel of the Son of God. Something was said last week in our Editorial Forum about the continued and constant need of self-sacrifice in church life and work. The incident of this enthusiastic gift of American women comes to strengthen the faith of all that the church still has much of the same holy zeal that made martyrs in the early days and will lead it to ultimate triumph.

The Unseen Helper

THERE were a few remarkable coincidences in getting together some of the material for this anniversary issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

The sermon for the week had not been selected within a few days of going to press. The first instalment of Pastor Sheldon's new story had already been set up. Then there came from Bishop Wilson the manuscript of his great sermon which appears on another page. It was preached recently at Ocean Grove, but the CHRISTIAN HERALD editors did not know of it. And it came just in time to keep company with the first chapters of Dr. Sheldon's serial. In it the bishop asks the same questions dealt with in the story. What would Jesus think and say and do if he were present in various real and practical situations and circumstances of to-day's busy life? But Bishop Wilson says: "He does come to our town"; He has entered our home"; "He does walk our streets." The message of the sermon is the message of the story—Jesus is here!

But this was not all. When the lessons for the young people's meetings for the week were looked up, it was found that the subject assigned to two of these societies was the "Heavenly Helper," and that the first verse of the Scripture lesson contained the words: "He hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

To some, these events will appear to be mere coincidences, but may it not be that the Master himself brought these things to pass just for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that he is present in the world to-day, not in theory or fancy, but in fact? We know he is here, for he declared positively: "Lo, I am with you alway." "He hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." Since this is true, "we may boldly say, the Lord is my helper."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD could hope for nothing better on its birthday than to wake people up throughout the world to the fact that Jesus is here. Apparently, in ways unthought of, he has helped us to emphasize this statement and to drive it home.

Yuan Shi Kai

CHINA'S "Strong Man" has come to his own. In the election of Yuan Shi Kai as president of the great Eastern Republic, choice has been made of the only man who is capable of bringing the nation through the struggle that has yet to be faced before the republic is firmly established. His wide experience in military affairs and as administrator, cabinet officer, and premier gives assurance of a skill and equipment equal to any emergency, and his government will command respect and confidence both at home and abroad. Under his leadership, and with internal peace restored, the republic will have a clear way open for those reforms that are needed to give it its proper place of power and influence among the nations. It has been said that China is to-day a republic only in name, and that Yuan is an autocrat at heart, with strong monarchical leanings; but it is only his personal enemies who thus prejudge his administration. Those who have the best interests of China at heart will await the event and give loyal aid in bringing about national peace and prosperity.

Accident Injures Jewish Worshipers

THE congregation of Talmud Torah was about to hold religious services in Claremont Hall, One Hundred and Sixth Street, New York City, in observance of the Jewish New Year, when without warning the gallery gave way and fell, pinning a number of persons under it. A dozen or so of the worst injured were hurried to the hospital, and the miracle is that a large number of lives was not lost. There were five hundred persons in the hall at the time, and prudence on the part of the leaders and the almost immediate presence of policemen and firemen prevented the sacrifice of life from panic which so often follows in similar circumstances. The Jews, though scattered to the ends of the earth, are a powerful people. They have survived persecutions that have been cruel beyond description. Legal restrictions against them have been lifted from most of the countries of Europe, and they have achieved marvelous success in the realms of science, finance, and government, taking their places in cabinets and parliaments. Fifty years ago there were only 30,000 Jews in the United States; now there are three million or more, about one-half of whom live in New York City. Under their complete liberty and splendid opportunity they have gone to the forefront in the metropolis in almost every department of endeavor. Their children crowd the schools and colleges and are prominent in the learned professions. Their synagogues are scattered widely, from the gorgeous ones on Fifth Avenue to the humble one in which the congregation of the Talmud Torah worshiped and at which their New Year's service was interrupted by the collapse of the gallery. The feast of the New Year, which the congregation was observing when the accident came, is the most important in the modern Jewish calendar. It has been observed since the days of Moses, and leaving out the sacrifices, and with a few variations in the ritual, its observance is the same as in the days of Christ. The services call for threefold prayers as described in the Mishna. The first is one of adoration to the sovereign God; the second is one of recognition of divine providence, of meditation, of penitence, for forgiveness; the third is one of jubilee in hope of the new era of enlightenment and holiness promised to the nations in the future. The Christian world hopes that the third prayer in the ritual of the Jewish New Year's celebration may be answered in the vision and acceptance of the only perfect man, a Jew, Christ the Messiah, by the Hebrews. This is the record of the foundation of the feast:

Speak unto the children, saying, In the seventh month, in the first day of the month, shall ye have a Sabbath, a memorial of blowing of trumpets, a holy convocation. Ye shall do no servile work therein: but ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord. (Lev. 23: 24, 25.)

CLAREMONT HALL AFTER THE COLLAPSE OF THE BALCONY

Nine-Year-Old Burglar

ONE of the worst records of depravity is the story of Willie Harrington, only nine years old, who was arraigned before Judge Hiram Crosby in Hackensack, N. J., the other day. The little burglar, who lives in upper Manhattan, confessed to having committed a dozen robberies in the neighborhood, all by himself. "Burglar Bill" said he had stolen two gold watches, a revolver, a silver mesh bag, clothing, a box of handkerchiefs, several razors, and money, sometimes as much as $15 at a time. He got into the houses and out of them without detection. He took his loot home from Jersey on the last car and ferry. A policeman in the neighborhood at Hackensack noticed the strange boy, and had suspicion disarmed by the boy's saying he was one of the Harringtons on the hill. Harringtons did live on the hill. But he got saucy with the officer the next time he was questioned, and the policeman detected his crime. Something is to be charged to unfortunate environment, but also much to the demon in the human heart, which often manifests itself so early in life and illustrates this Scripture:

The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. (Jer. 17: 9.)

Died Singing in Church

WHEN singing a Welsh hymn, the translation of which is "I'll Obey Thy Will This Moment," Mrs. Henry B. Evans, thirty-six years old, dropped dead in the Tabernacle Welsh Congregational Church in Scranton, Pa., at the morning service of the first Sunday in October. The sentiment of the song was an important one to be known and lived, "I will obey thy will this moment." In these days of stupendous achievement everywhere the human will is liable to become proud and independent, and say, "I am able to do these and all else that I desire." When in our modern rush we give our undivided attention to the affairs of this life, its gains, its appetites, its ambitions are so insistent, the will so often yields to these temptations, forgetting what God might think of us or our conduct. When the gates of glory were flung open to this devout Christian woman, she was singing the prayer that she might obey God's will that every moment. The spirit of this song McKinley expressed on his deathbed. He said to his wife that the tragedy was not his way, nor hers, but it was God's, and then in the eyes of the nation and centuries, he took up this part of our Lord's Prayer and said:

Thy will be done. (Matt. 6: 10.)

What Helen Keller Sees

HELEN KELLER is one of the most remarkable women in the world. She is blind, but oh, how keenly she sees! She is deaf, but how accurately she hears! Some of her visions of life have been recorded in a book she has just published, called Out of the Dark. Her views of young people getting an education and of the responsibilities awaiting them are thus beautifully described: "In college you will be brought face to face with nearly all the fundamental questions of life and you will learn how many men have tried to solve them. Hitch your wagon to a happy star, and you also shall help to solve them. The world needs your intellect, your scholarship, but most of all your hearts—hearts that are loving, brave, hopeful, happy. Does all this dream of high privilege and noble service seem far beyond the reach of your powers of mind? Remember what Senator Hoar said: 'Much of the good work of the world has been that of dull people who have done their best.' Be happy, talk happiness. Happiness calls out responsive gladness in others. There is enough sadness in the world without yours. The great, enduring realities are love and service. Joy is the holy fire that keeps our purpose warm and our intelligence aglow. Learn from your books not only the day's lesson, but the life lesson. In all knowledge, in the classics, in science, in history and literature, and in mathematics you will see the struggle of man to get nearer to God. Resolve, then, as you stand on the threshold of your student days, with an enlightened optimism to consecrate your education to the service of others. When your thoughts become pessimistic, when it seems as if all men were deafened by the tumult of trade, blinded by self-interest and greed, turn the pages of your history of England, and you will find that the ideas which shaped the Anglo-Saxon race were not mean or sordid. American history, too, is filled with heroes and martyrs who joyfully pushed aside ambition and gave their lives to the common weal. The world needs more of this spirit of service. There is still many a desert place where the sun of love and the light of truth have not shone." This is not the vision of the eyes of flesh, but of the eyes of the soul. Helen Keller sees material facts, their relation to each other, the beauty behind them, and the God behind and underneath all, her Friend and Saviour. She gives a striking illustration of the blessedness of those of whom Christ spoke:

Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. (Matt. 5: 8.)

Entombed Miner Free

THOMAS TOSHESKY was on October 4 rescued from the chamber of a coal mine near Centralia, Pa., in which he had been entombed for eight days. Day and night the work of rescue was strenuously prosecuted. At the last one man at a time, on his knees, had to work with the pick. When released Toshesky had worked toward his rescuers several feet. When he got to the top of the mine his wife, who had hung about the rescuers almost incessantly, fell to the ground with words of joy and a prayer of gratitude. He was very little the worse for his long imprisonment and though an ambulance was near to carry him to his home he declined it and started to walk, but was persuaded to enter an automobile and ride. The people of the neighborhood were wild with joy and shouts of greeting as he appeared and passed on his journey home, where he embraced his four children who were waiting for him. When the rescuers had gotten nearly to him they called out to ask him what he was doing. In broken English he said: "I get ready to move. This no good boarding house, no good bed, no spring." From Friday till Tuesday he had not a bite to eat or drop to drink till they bored a hole down, through which they sent food and drink. He had been entombed twice before, and said he believed he would be saved the third time. How many people are imprisoned in the chambers of evil habit and of sin, and how many good people there are who, giving themselves up diligently to the task of rescuing them, take up the words of the psalmist:

He brought me up also out of a horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings. (Ps. 40: 2.)

THE COST OF PEACE

AMIDST the nations of the world is growing the realization that not gain but loss must follow war, both to the vanquished and the victor. A few years ago Norman Angell in The Great Illusion proved this thesis, and the fire-eaters aux grandes moustaches of the old school cried, "Dead are the brave days of old!" And all the great world of commerce answered back: "And well dead, too. No more shall nations fight on impulse and reap the aftermath of bitterness."

That peace pays is now an axiom of commerce and, dispute it who will, commerce rules the world. The object of every nation in its armies and its armaments is insurance for peace. Whether this end is best achieved by the maintenance of vast armies and the training of the entire nation for war, or by the pursuit of commerce under the protection of a comparatively small army, is the problem that now agitates Great Britain.

War has its uses, and Britain learned one of them when she fought in South Africa. That struggle gave her a salutary glimpse of the inferno which General Sherman said war is, and no man looks therein and sees life as he knew it before. In the hardships and uncertainty of war, enervation is lost. War makes or breaks, and its make is a stalwart breed. England learned, and now a group of militarists, with Lord Roberts—loved throughout the British Empire as "Bobs"—as their leader, can see no other solution for their nation's problems both at home and in the polity of nations than compulsory military service for all Englishmen.

From the camp of those who would maintain Britain's navy at the two-power strength, but who contest the idea of added military strength, come arguments which must give pause to such logicians as Britain's greatest living field marshal, Lord Roberts. It is quite evident that the wish of the commercialists is the spring from which flowed a recent article in The Sphere (London, Eng.). Yet neither its source nor the fact that it is frankly propagandist literature robs its researches of their just value.

THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE
Germany, 19 per cent.; Austria, 14 per cent.; Italy, 16 per cent.

UNITED STATES

GREAT BRITAIN
6 per cent.

THE DUAL ALLIANCE
Russia, 48 per cent.; France, 14 per cent.

"Trade is more profitable than conquest," avers the British writer, "and to carry on trade peace conditions are essential, not only in the great nations but in all the other nations which trade with them. Every public man of intelligence and every truly patriotic militarist sees in the army and navy a form of peace insurance whereby the country will be saved from the disaster of war. Regarded in this practical light we may consider impartially the relation which armament cost bears to the trade it protects in each nation."

From tables giving the totals of the national trade which pays the taxes for the support of armies and navies we learn that the Triple Alliance (Germany, Austria and Italy) does an annual business of $5,695,920,000; the Dual Alliance (France and Russia) has a yearly trade of $320,760,000; the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, leading the world, has $6,006,960,000; the United States of America is next in rank with $3,902,580,000. The figures for Germany are given separately for purposes of later comparison. They are $3,596,400,000. These round-figure comparisons show that the United States has beaten Germany, and we know that our progress in trade is being made more rapidly than that of any other nation. "France, Russia, and the rest of Europe are far behind in the race, and give no indication that they can draw level with the leaders. The trade of the world is almost an Anglo-Saxon monopoly.

"The sums given above represent the buying and selling of the nations in the international market. They are an index to the industry of each people, to the resources of the country, and to the wisdom of the government. They also represent part of the enormous stake which is gambled in war. If the trade of a country declines thousands of people are driven from the land by poverty; armies and navies cannot keep them there. A nation lives only by its productive work.

"This great and ever-growing trade between the nations can develop only in peace. The very act of preparing for war dislocates the industries of a country, and in a conscript nation trade is automatically shut down with the mobilization for war. Before a shot has been fired a commercial conscript nation begins to lose money because it is losing trade. The belligerent Power is automatically boycotted from the international market. It has little or nothing to sell, for its factories are idle; the trading ships of other nations keep away from its ports. Thus, however the campaign goes, there is heavy commercial loss from the time of mobilization. As the war goes on trade declines still further. Food prices advance, other nations take over the foreign trade of the combatants, and when the victorious side closes the campaign it finds that it has to commence another kind of campaign in order to build up its ruined trade with the rest of the world. Acute industrial depression invariably follows a war, and this phase will be more marked in the wars of the future."

It were bad enough if the enormous sums named above were only the stakes of war when the grim dogs are loosed, but that is not all; the watchdog must be fed, and that is no small task. The Triple Alliance for its 1,555,000 soldiers and sailors (before Germany's new scheme was put in effect) paid $563,760,000. The Dual Alliance with its 1,900,000 men pays each year $617,220,000. The maintenance of Great Britain's army and navy, which contain 380,000 men, costs $349,920,000, and for our own army and navy the United States pays only $218,700,000, though it employs 156,000 men. Germany under her new scheme for 1913 holds the unenviable leadership of the world for military expenditure. She will have 860,000 men in arms, and it will cost her $602,640,000. This vast wealth Germany believes she must expend "in guarding commercial interests which are no more valuable and certainly not as promising as those of the United States.

"America has built up her world trade in a phenomenally short time without making war. She captures trade, not territory. With one small army and one navy she guards land which is greater in area than Germany, Austria, Italy, Russia in Europe, and France. Roughly it may be said that the United States with its possessions has almost the same area as Europe, and to keep the peace in Europe some twenty armies are required, costing over $1,069,200,000 a year. Add navy costs and the total comes to nearly $2,000,000,000. Whilst Americans pay $218,700,000 a year in taxes to support their fighting forces, the six great Powers of Europe expend $1,526,040,000. Put in another way, the industries and commerce of Europe are taxed to the extent of over $1,000,000,000 a year in excess of the United States. This extra tax is a direct loss to the people. Nevertheless, there is infinitely greater risk of war in Europe than in America.

"There is yet another important economic matter to consider. The Triple Alliance has 1,555,000 men under arms on the normal peace footing. The Dual Alliance has 1,900,000. The five Powers thus keep 3,455,000 men out of industrial occupation as against 156,000 men employed in the army and navy of America and 380,000 men in this country (Great Britain). Every workingman serving as a soldier is unproductive."

Assuming that these men will average an earning power of only $100 per year, there is a loss to the great military nations of Europe of $345,500,000 against a similar loss of $38,000,000 in Great Britain and $15,600,000 in the United States. (This last comparison is hardly fair, as earning capacity is higher in England than on the Continent, and still higher in America.) To give a clear conception of the incidence of military support on the commerce of the world the writer in the Sphere adds the taxes and labor losses and states their percentage of the entire trade turnover of each nation. So he proves that for its peace insurance Russia pays 48 per cent.; Germany (under the new laws), 19 per cent.; France and Austria, 14 per cent.; Italy 16 per cent.; Great Britain, 6 per cent. and the United States, 5 per cent." The readiest explanation of the enormous difference in the rates of taxation is that it represents the value of the sea frontier. The United States and England are cut off by the sea from powerful and bellicose neighbors. We protect our sea power and our sea trade with a navy and as long as that remains supreme the army need be of but secondary consideration. The navy is a concentrated form of fighting force needing relatively few men, and owing to its mobility it is of greater utility than an army to a great commercial nation with world-wide interests."

The difference in the tax aggregates shown by the percentages can only come from the profits of business or from drastically reduced wages, and neither of these can suffer alone. Reduced wages will drive the best workers into the new countries, and the quality of products must consequently decline.

"The danger most apparent in Europe is that the ever-growing expenditure will eventually bring some of the Powers near bankruptcy. The militarist will demand more men and more money; the impoverished workers competing under a great handicap against America will be less fitted to meet the demands; in desperation a mad policy of war may suggest itself and the populace become inflamed with the idea that a victorious war will restore prosperity. This would be suicidal folly. But apart from the military and political problems Europe is vitally concerned as a whole in the economic problem of obtaining its peace insurance cheaply. Excessive expenditure on armaments will so tax its resources that 'new' countries safely removed from the turmoil of Europe may in time beat us out of the markets of the world. What the United States has done and is doing may be done also by Canada, Japan, and parts of South America. The best workers will be tempted by higher wages to the new industrial nations, and gradually the militarist nations of Europe may sink to poverty and impotency."

The New Philippine Administration

THERE is a probability that the independence of the Philippines may yet assume the proportions of a national issue. Governor General Harrison, lately appointed administrator in these islands, brought the issue to the front in an inaugural address delivered at Manila on October 6, the day of his arrival. Speaking with authority for the government in Washington, he assured the Filipinos that the new administration of the islands would work at every step with a view to their ultimate independence. He added: "With President Wilson's sentiments and policy I am in complete accord. Within the scope of my office, I shall do my utmost to aid in the fulfilment of all promises, and I am confident we shall thereby hasten the coming day of independence." He warned them, however, that until "your independence is complete, we shall demand unremitting recognition of our sovereignty."

The governor general's announcement has excited intense interest throughout the archipelago. The population of the islands, according to the census of 1903, was about 7,635,426, but is probably now over 8,000,000. Although considerable progress has been made in educating and civilizing the native population, only 235,000 qualified for voting a year ago. It is evident that the larger task is still far from complete. Slavery and peonage must be wiped out; the prevalent illiteracy must give place to a well-planned system of education; and the rank and file of the people have yet to be trained for independence.

One of the most important features in connection with the new administration is that it will fall to the Flipino majority on the commission to deal with the wild tribes, who have been dealt with by the Americans heretofore, and who still constitute the most difficult problem in the islands.

Questions and Answers

L. R. D., Missouri. In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 10 you answered C. F. H., who was inquiring about short-story writing as an avocation. You say, "Of the thousands of short stories written and sent in to papers and magazines only a very small percentage have any literary value." Could you give me a few reasons why so many are unsalable?

The real trouble is that fiction writing is a more difficult art than most people realize. Because practically everybody knows how to write and is more or less used to writing letters it is easy to think that nothing is needed for the production of a story but the simple narration of an imaginary occurrence or chain of occurrences, in the ordinary manner of letter writing. But something more is needed. While the language of fiction should be simple and unaffected, yet to make it duly impressive a gift is required which is very rare, and to this, in almost every case, long and careful training must be added. The whole matter becomes plainer by a comparison with the art of painting. Almost every one can draw a little, and if he had colors at hand could make some headway at coloring what he has drawn. But not many people can get their paintings hung in the galleries. That honor comes only to a few, and after long and painful study and work. A magazine or weekly is like a gallery, and to get a story accepted is like having a picture hung in it. This may give some idea how it is that so few story manuscripts "have any literary value." The conditions of sale are still more complex. Many a story that is thoroughly well written is rejected because it does not happen to fit into the immediate program of the periodical to which it is sent. Finally, editors are fallible, and sometimes fail to recognize a good piece of work when it is in their hands, though the editors are naturally not so ready to admit this as the contributors are to suspect it.

Mrs. Isabella L., Hamden, N. Y. The passage in Nahum 2: 4 (which is sometimes quoted as being a prediction of the automobile) refers to the advance of the forces appointed for the destruction of Nineveh. The Medes probably had chariots armed with steel scythes which, glittering in the sunlight, might be likened to the gleaming of torches. The term "raging" in the streets is descriptive of their furious haste, as running "like lightnings" is meant to picture their rapidity and violence. In your letter you quote the line: "Carriages without horses shall go." That is not in the Bible, but is a quotation from the well-known Mother Shipton prophecy, a clever fabrication, which while pretending to be several centuries old, is comparatively recent.

L. J. R., Bristol, Tenn. All that we know of Paul's personal appearance, from his own writings, is found in II Cor. 10: 10, which indicates that he did not possess the advantage of a distinguished or imposing presence. His stature was somewhat diminutive, his eyesight weak (see Acts 23: 5 and Gal. 4: 15) nor did he regard his address as impressive. Much of this personal criticism, however, may have been the outcome of the apostle's desire to avoid magnifying himself or his own talents. A fourth century tablet represents him as venerable-looking and dignified, with a high, bald forehead, full-bearded, and with features indicating force of character. One ancient writer says Paul's nose was strongly aquiline. All the early pictures and mosaics, as well as some of the early writers (among them Malalus and Nicephorus) agree in describing the apostle as of short stature, with long face, prominent eyebrows, clear complexion and a winning expression, the whole aspect being that of power and dignity. The oldest known portrait is the Roman panel of the fourth century, already referred to above.

G. H. R., Shiremanstown, Pa. 1. The passage in Heb. 10: 26 is interpreted as relating to presumptuous sin, that is: sin done knowingly and deliberately, after the individual has been to a certain extent spiritually enlightened. Apostasy in such a case is not an act of conscience, or error or infirmity, but a deliberate sinning against the Spirit. 2. The passage in Isa. 45: 7 is not held to refer to moral evil, but to physical disturbance or disorder, as the related verses clearly show. The evil here referred to is that discord or disaster which is in violent contrast with peace and order. 3. Jer. 48: 10 has reference to the divinely appointed devastation of Moab. To show how surely the divine wrath was directed against that wicked land, the Chaldeans, who were to be the instrument for carrying out Moab's punishment, were warned, in this denunciatory passage, that they themselves would come under condemnation if they were careless or indifferent in performing this duty.

Mrs. W. P. H., Sterling, Ill. According to the Encyclopedia of Missions (second edition), the Presbyterians have ten churches and four or five preaching places in the Philippines; Methodists, three stations and twenty-seven preaching-places; Baptists, three churches and six stations; United Bretbren, several stations; Congregational Board also well represented; Missionary Alliance, three centers and twenty-seven preaching-places; and the native "Evangelical Union" has also a group of preaching stations. These figures doubtless have materially increased in the last few years. The American and Foreign Bible Societies circulate from 80,000 to 100,000 Bibles or portions of Scripture in the islands. The spiritual and educational work is very promising.

A Reader, Beagle, Kan. I am writing for your most earnest prayers in my behalf that I may fully consecrate my heart and life to the Lord and that I can say, "Thy will, O Lord, be done in me at all times."

The question of consecration is one that frequently arises, yet when we stop to analyze it it seems strange that there should be any difficulty about it. If you possess anything which you wish to give to another, you simply give it to him; it is just as simple as that to give your whole heart and life to God. We already belong to him absolutely; in consecration we are only returning what is his. The question how we can take ourselves out of God's hands should really be more difficult than the question how we may submit ourselves to him. Remember that God is always reasonable, always kind. Many of the things sometimes suggested to our minds when the subject of consecration is brought up are not the suggestion of the Holy Spirit, but of our own minds, or of disturbing spirits. There is no uncertainty about the voice of God. He only asks us to obey him when he makes duty clear, and has promised to give us grace and power always for the duties he gently lays upon us. There surely should be no unwillingness to submit our lives to him; he can care for them and direct them much better than we. Consecration becomes easy when we approach the cross of Christ. We realize there that he gave himself for us because we were sinners—because of this very unwillingness in our hearts to surrender ourselves to him. Knowing this it is not hard to commit ourselves absolutely to his love, trusting him to forgive our sins, to cleanse our hearts, to guide and to keep us.

DURING the coming weeks the musicians of the world and especially of Italy will celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Giuseppe Verdi, the great Italian operatic composer. At the great musical center in Milan, Italy, special presentations of his most famous and popular works are to be given, and in New York, Chicago, London, Paris and Berlin memorial presentations are taking place. The place of this musician in the hearts of his countrymen was shown by the mass of flowers that, on the anniversary of his birth, banked the pedestal of the statue they have erected to his memory in New York. Verdi was born on October 10, 1813, at Roncole, a village near the city of Busseto, Italy. His parents were the keepers of the little inn and shop of the village. When, as a mere child, Verdi was placed in a business house in Busseto his musical education began. His advance was phenomenally rapid. Within a few months he was composing, and his first symphony was written at fifteen years of age. His first great public success came in 1842, but his musical development was yet incomplete, and it was not till 1851 that he produced an opera for posterity. That was Rigoletto. Then came Il Trovatore, La Traviata, and in a few years later Aida, the Requiem and Otello. These are his greatest works, and there is little doubt that airs from some of these operas are known to more people of all nations than any other piece of music, except the old Hanoverian air which is the British national anthem and to which we sing "America." Before his death, on January 27, 1901, the aged musician donated a goodly sum to the House of Repose in Milan, a home for old and poor musicians, and directed that all the royalties from his operas should go toward its support.

A. C. N., Jacksonville, Fla. Many pastors rigidly hold to the rule that all business matters, including the finances of the church, should be transacted week-days, and Sunday left for spiritual refreshing and physical rest and recuperation. It would certainly be an innovation for church members to devote Sunday afternoon to a canvass for church expenses, missionary work and benevolence; yet there might be an emergency which, for the moment at least, would completely change the aspect of the case. Therefore, not knowing all the circumstances, we cannot judge.

W. B., Orlando, Fla. The Garraway Mission, Liberia, West Africa, was founded by the Methodists. Although the climate of Liberia is an unwholesome one, American missionaries have lived and do live there. The missions of Liberia are the Protestant Episcopal, Methodist and Evangelical Lutheran, and in Sierra Leone, the Methodist and United Brethren. Our nation has aided Liberia materially in the formation and establishment of its government, and has assisted in securing the recognition of its independence, otherwise it would probably have been gobbled up long ago.

Miscellaneous

S. A. M., Tropico, Calif. The passage you want is to be found in I. Cor. 8: 6.

Mrs. J. F. N., Greenville, Texas. Unquestionably with a quill pen—the only kind used in those days.

Mrs. J. O. F., Glensboro, Ky. We do not know the names you mention. Write to The Medical Record, New York, for accurate information.

Dr. George A. Fraser, Park Hill, Ont., Canada, inquires if some reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can give him the name of the author of the poem beginning: "God of all worlds, source and supreme of things."

M. A., Kansas City, Mo. We should imagine that the matrimonial experience of the person in question would make him rather dubious about repeating it. The divorce laws are different in various States. He should consult an experienced lawyer.

A. M. W., Sanborn, Ind. We have no means of knowing the ratio of administrative expenses of the various missionary boards, but we believe they are all efficiently and economically conducted. The only way to get the information you desire is to write to the boards direct.

CHRISTIAN HERALD readers in Canada or elsewhere, who would be interested in helping a small struggling interdenominational church, very much in need of repairs, may learn all the facts about the case by writing to D. McCarty, South Rawdon, Hants County, Nova Scotia.

J. C., Griggsville, Ill. Commentators hold that the Ethiopian (or Cushite) woman mentioned in Num. 12 as the wife of Moses, against whom Aaron and Miriam complained, was Zipporah. Their opposition is believed to have been caused by jealousy of her relatives and their influence.

L. P. B., Cement, Okla. It is vain to speculate on the time of the world's end. The Bible distinctly tells us that the day and the hour when the final prophecies are to be fulfilled "no man knowetb." Our duty is to live righteously here and now, and to leave the future to be revealed in God's good time.

Buffalonian Reader. It is said that Holmes, in his Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, was the first to apply the term "Hub" to Boston. He wrote: "Boston State House is the 'Hub' of the solar system. You couldn't pry that out of a Boston man if you had the tire of all creation straightened out for a crowbar."

Reader, Colusa, Calif. See Matt. 22: 30 and Mark 12: 25. It is not necessary to infer, however, that love and affection will be wanting; but they will be sublimated and purified and suited to the conditions of that celestial realm where nothing that is of the earth earthly can enter, and where all are as the angels.

It has various uses: Calling the assembly to order, suppressing interruptions, and, in the hands of a vigorous chairman, sometimes cutting short the remarks of a speaker who may be transgressing the rules.

DOUBLE-MIND OR SINGLE-HEART?

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THOSE who were boys and not to blame when the grown-ups accepted the report of the ten faithless and fearful spies that the Moabites and Amorites and Jebusites and "sites" of other tribes in the Land of Promise could not be driven out, are now grown up themselves, for thirty-eight years have elapsed, and this new generation is marching to Canaan by a new route, conquering and to conquer those very foes. Their victories over Sihon, king of the Amorites, and Og, king of Bashan, were so notable that they became a part of Israel's battle hymn (Psalm 136):

O give thanks unto the Lord of lords;
For his lovingkindness endureth forever;
To him that smote great kings;
For his lovingkindness endureth forever;
Sihon, king of the Amorites;
For his lovingkindness endureth forever;
And Og, king of Bashan;
For his lovingkindness endureth forever.

And now the camp of the Israelites, about one hundred thousand in all, as shown in last lesson, was pitched opposite the Moabites, who dwelt east of the Dead Sea. Balak was their "king," or we would say chief, for these "kings" were heads of savage tribes, few, if any, of which, probably, were more than one hundred thousand in number at that time. His tribe was probably much smaller than that, for the camps of Israel seemed to him to "cover the face of the earth." He had heard how Israel had beaten the Amorites, and felt that he could never win in battle unless he could get help from some god or demon through a magician or prophet, as kings and chiefs often tried to do in those days. So he sent messages to a famous prophet named Balaam, who lived at Pethor on the Euphrates River, among the Chaldeans, who were noted for their magicians. (From that country came later the Magi to the Infant Jesus, following the "star" of which we shall hear in this lesson that Balaam prophesied.) It was a strange thing to find a prophet or any one knowing the true God at all outside the Israelites, but way back in the days of Abraham, Job, of that same country, knew God and bore severe tests of his fidelity. Now we come on another Gentile who knew God, this one only half good—hardly that—but through him God sometimes spoke.

Let us not delay here for debate on the psychological problem of the double personality of this ancient Dr. Jekyl and Mr. Hyde, except so far as may be necessary to understand Balak's point of view in appealing to Balaam. In those days (as to-day in heathen lands), it was supposed that the air was full of little demons, who had the power of gods, and it was believed that magicians could get control of them and box them up in a hollow stick, or even in a ring, like storage batteries, and use their powers for the advantage of any who hired the magician, and particularly to aid him against his foes. Perhaps Balak really thought that Balaam was more than a magician, as he was, and thought to hire his influence with the true God, as Simon (Acts 8: 18-24) thought that the gift of the Holy Spirit for the working of wonders could be purchased with money. Simon's case helps us to understand Balaam also, only that God in the New Testament would not give his Spirit to a covetous sorcerer, as he seems to have done in the rude times of the Old Testament to Balaam. If that seems mysterious, let us reflect that it is a wonder that God to-day puts the "treasure" of his truth into such "earthen vessels" as even the best men know themselves to be. Suffice it that when God spoke through such a battered pewter trumpet as Balaam, it was only a little more surprising. (Teachers will need to read carefully three and a half chapters, Num. 22, 23, 24 and 31: 1-20, to get the whole record of Balaam, so that they may vividly, yet briefly, tell the eventful story so far as may be necessary to get from it the encouragement and warning which it contains for young and old to-day.)

Balak's messengers said to Balaam, "Come, curse me this people, . . . for I know he whom thou blessest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed." Balaam was eager for the royal "rewards of divination" they brought, and so he said, "Lodge here this night, and I will bring you word as Jehovah shall speak to me." God said to Balaam, "Thou shalt not go with them; thou shalt not curse the people, for they are blessed." So the messengers were sent back with a report of God's reply. But Balak thought he had failed only because he had not made his bribe big enough, and this time he sent more princely messengers and promises of "honor" as well as money. But Balaam answered, "If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold I cannot go beyond the word of Jehovah to do less or more." But because Balaam "loved the wages of righteousness" (II Peter 2: 15), he bade the messengers tarry, hoping God would change his orders. And God said that night to Balaam, "Go with them, but only the word which I speak unto thee, that shalt thou do."

When Balaam the prophet had come to Balak the king, the latter again spoke of honor and rewards, and the former again said, "The word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak." Then came great sacrifices to Jehovah of oxen and sheep, in valley and on hilltop, and Balaam went again to ask God whether he might curse Israel. What an instructive struggle is this which is so dramatically pictured between covetousness and ambition on the one hand and conscience and duty on the other! Balaam's case was like the struggle in Jacob between conscience and covetousness, only conscience won at last in Jacob and lost at last in Balaam. In every Sunday school class, the struggle between selfishness and duty is sure to be going on in some soul, which is hesitating about some duty lest some selfish interest should be sacrificed, not always money or honor—sometimes merely a "good time," or perhaps the good opinion of bad companions.

God gave Balaam a message of blessing for Israel to utter there on the hilltop, with the far-stretching encampment of Israel in full sight below. And Balak took him to another hill, where there were more sacrifices, and another consultation, with like result; and on a third hilltop it was all repeated again. Balak, angry but persistent, tried a fourth time, and the blessing uttered by Balaam for Israel was greater than ever, culminating in a promise that the Israelites should not only conquer their Land of Promise, but the world, through the coming Messiah, the Christ.

There shall come forth a star out of Jacob,
And a scepter shall rise out of Israel.

No doubt Balaam spoke better than he knew, "moved by the Holy Spirit," as Peter explains the inspiration of prophets.

The sad sequel of the story would seem incredible were it not that it is so true to human nature in all ages. Balaam, despite God's patient teaching, goes among the Midianites, and curses Israel at last by deeds worse than any words; and when these sins of Israel and Midian are punished by wholesale executions, such as were needed in those days for such wholesale sins, Balaam, who had prayed, "Let me die the death of the righteous," dies instead as an executed criminal. (Num. 31: 8, 16.)

Balaam's story and his prophecies contain three great messages for us: (1) God uses imperfect men; (2) double-minded men must become single hearted or fail; (3) the Sunday school is the new generation of Israel that through Christ can conquer the world.

Almost every biography in the Bible contains this encouragement: that God uses imperfect men, often very sinful men; sometimes heathen, as in the case of King Cyrus, whom God 'girded,' though Cyrus 'did not know him'; sometimes even enemies, as when Caiaphas prophesied that 'one should die for the people."

The Bible presents several good illustrations besides Balaam of "double-minded" and half-hearted or "half-baked" men, such as are described in the familiar passage: "Ephraim is a cake not turned." Jehu was such a man, zealous for God, and yet not predominantly good. A distinguished man once said that Christ's division of men into sheep and goats was not scientific. The division line between good and evil, he said, runs not between men but through them. Every man, he would have us think, is partly sheep and partly goat. It is true that there is good and evil in every man, but whether he is sheep or goat, good or bad, is determined by the dominance of good or the dominance of evil in his life. Which is habitual master, which ultimate master—that determines his classification. Alas, it is a pitiful fact that there are all about us men and women of whom it is true: neither they nor the world know which is dominant. Hypocrisy is the ugly word that describes a double life that has in it not only religious professions but sometimes sincere aspirations, like those of Balaam; but whose dominant power is covetousness or self-indulgence.

From Balaam's wrecked life, let us turn to the great prophecy of conquest God gave through him to that new generation of Israel. They were to conquer their own land and the world—their own land, that through it they might bless the world; and the world for Christ and through Christ, for the making of a "better world" here and now. I like to think of that new generation of Israel "marching to Zion" in the strength of the promised Christ, and to think of the twenty-eight millions of the world's Sunday school army of to-day, a great majority of them the "new generation," answering the call of the World's Sunday School Convention at Zürich to make their own country a "Holy Land." Only through the Spirit of Christ can we conquer our own selfishness and sin and the organized, commercialized sins of the world.

We may all have the requisite machinery in perfection, and willing devoted workers, but what is absolutely needful for success is the power of the Holy Spirit—the breath from heaven must start the work, and the same breath must keep it going. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts."

These are the gifts I ask
Of thee, Spirit serene:
Strength for the daily task,
Courage to face the road,
Good cheer to help me bear the traveler's load,
And for the hours of rest that come between,
An inward joy in all things heard and seen.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—WHAT IS YOUR opinion about the singing of little children in the Sunday school?"—C. B. M., Des Moines, Iowa.

It is through songs that the most lasting impressions are made upon children, because it is the time in the development of the mind when the rhythmic instinct is uppermost. Froebel, the founder of the kindergarten, loved to tell how interested he was in a song that was sung on the very first day he attended school when barely five years of age. He said: "It became a hymn of life to me." Such testimony as this should make Sunday school teachers very thoughtful about the songs they select for their little scholars. At the World's Sunday School Convention in Zürich, Mr. Carey Bonner gave a most helpful talk along this line, speaking not only as an expert musician, but as a lover of little children. Some of the points made by him are as follows: "Awaken reverence; it is the vital keynote of character." He suggested that "reverence verses" precede singing.

"Awaken intelligent interest in the song," said Mr. Bonner. This the teacher can do by talking in a clear and loving manner about the song before asking the children to sing it, and by the teacher singing it herself, or together with two or three little children to whom she has already taught the song. If possible, pictures illustrating the song should be shown. Give each child a copy of the song, at least the words, to take home for "mother to sing."

"Awaken a glad response," said Mr. Bonner. This certainly can not be done by urging the children to sing "louder" or "faster." Noise is the most undesirable accompaniment of song. When the song is gently and sweetly sung, it is doing its best work.

—CONTINUING THE DISCUSSION which we began in last week's Round Table, Mrs. Mary Foster Bryner, elementary secretary of the International Sunday School Association, told how the Sunday school of a Christian church of Canton, Ohio, was increased in eleven years from two hundred members to four thousand. First of all, the church list was systematically canvassed, and hundreds, old and young, were found to be missing from the school roll. These were assigned to suitable persons to be brought in by kindly persistency and divine strategy if necessary. Then every block of the city was assigned to a watcher, who reported every new family that moved in, and as promptly as the iceman and the milkman securing trade, some one called and welcomed the family to the church fellowships of the city. If the family were found to have attended a Methodist or Baptist or Presbyterian Church in the city whence they came, they were told of the churches of their own denomination near to their new home, and the pastor was also notified. But if the family had no church preferences, they were invited to the Christian Sunday school, and not given up if they did not accept the first call. Mrs. Bryner also told of a school where a similar increase had come from a well organized plan to follow up such families by sending boys to get the boys, and men for the men, and girls for girls.

REV. FRANK E. LOVELAND, of Topeka, Kan., told that his Sunday school of two thousand owed its growth most of all to the erection of a Sunday school temple that provided facilities equal to any high school building. The other methods previously described of canvassing for members had been used, but he believed that providing such a plant was half the victory, and that such a plant was possible in any large city if churches and Sunday schools were not too much subdivided. Such a plant will attract stronger teachers and officers. In the Topeka case a leading lawyer is superintendent and a very competent secretary "magnifies that office," and the men's class is taught by a leading physician and attended by the governor and attorney general. The speakers emphasized the fact that it is useless to bring pupils in if there is not something worth while for those who come that will keep them. The very first thing in a campaign for more members is to make such plans for competent, faithful teaching as will make a net strong enough to hold the first when they are caught.

1878 THIRTY-FIVE YEARS OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE 1913

THIRTY-FIVE years ago a man sat in an editorial room in the Bible House, poring over manuscripts. It was a small room, rather cramped, obscurely placed, and remote from the busy haunts of journalism. Few people in New York knew this man, who had come from London to found a new enterprise in Christian service, and few knew the work that he was here to establish.

The manuscripts were handwritten—old-timey, some people would call both them and their subject-matter to-day. Many a modern editor in these mechanical times of typewriter and rubber stamp would glance disdainfully at their venerable script. But time has been the test. They were foundation material, these manuscripts, granite and iron in the structure which was begun then and which has been building outward and upward throughout the years.

For THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was that structure founded in the little upper room of the Bible House in October, 1878, and the basic material out of which its first number was fashioned—a sermon by Charles Haddon Spurgeon and an article by T. DeWitt Talmage—was typical of all the material that has gone into thirty-five years of building.

FACSIMILE OF FIRST ISSUE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

The builders have been not only those who guided its editorial policy and contributed to the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but in a larger and more significant degree that vast host of Christian men and women of all churches and all sections who have formed the world-wide CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. Probably in the record of American Christianity there has been no single agency so permanently successful in bringing together for mutual effort the scattered forces of the Christian Army. In its ministry the denominations have stood shoulder to shoulder. Through its columns they have joined hands in mighty Christian enterprises for the glory of God and the betterment and spiritual upbuilding of their fellow men. Its editorial forum has been the forum of all. For in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD all the churches of God have found common ground.

It was something new to have a journal so broadly evangelical as to commend itself to all Christian denominations, as well as to those outside the denominational pale; which knew no sect or creed disputations, but treated all alike on the generous plane of Christian brotherhood and sisterhood; and which had for its watchword and foundation the Gospel of Jesus Christ in all its fulness and purity as handed down from Apostolic days; orthodox, undiluted, and uncorrupted.

Yet such in substance was THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S platform from the very first number issued, and it has never changed.

The opening paragraph of the foregoing prologue lifts the curtain on a dim retrospect, which will grow dimmer with the years. It is the inevitable. Just now, thirty-five years after, our memories are refreshed. We have gone to the little room and breathed again the atmosphere of the romantic past; have fancied ourselves sitting at the same old desk, facing the inner lightshaft, with those two handwritten manuscripts laid out before us. The shades of Talmage and Spurgeon have risen before our inner vision, only to fade away along with other spectral images of the vanishing past. But the setting is the same. The little room has not much changed. Though still used as an adjunct to a printery where job printing work is done, the surroundings and conditions are about as they were then. It was thus humbly cradled, sponsored by the two best known divines of that day, and dedicated to "the circulation of a pure Gospel," that The Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times (as it was then called) dared to enter the commercially precarious field of religious journalism. That it has in some degree justified the faith and fulfilled the desire that gave it being, its works attest. But all successes are comparative. It will be necessary to look both forward and backward in order to form a proper perspective of what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been, as periodical and as institution, what it is to-day on the occasion of its thirty-fifth anniversary, and what it will be to-morrow, and through the years to come.

When, in 1890, the late Dr. Louis Klopsch (proprietor and publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from that year till his untimely death in March, 1910) decided to offer copies of the Oxford Testament in combination with subscriptions to the paper, he scarcely realized the far-reaching significance of the step. During a conference with the manager of the New York office of the Oxford University Press, it was suggested that he offer the Oxford Teachers' Bible, instead of the Testament, placing an order for a special edition of 5,000 copies, autographed by Dr. Talmage. This, after some deliberation, he concluded to do, and the effect was miraculous. Before the end of the season Dr. Klopsch entered an order for an extra 10,000 Bibles, and the year following he placed additional orders for 40,000 more, aggregating a total of 55,000 Bibles within two years—each one of which represented a considerable addition to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S growing family of readers.

But the limit of possibilities had not yet been reached. Encouraged by the results of these endeavors, and inspired by a vision of the vast opportunity thus revealed to him, he later (in 1892) placed one more order for a total of 100,000 Bibles, of which number 80,000 were distributed widely throughout America and in nearly every other civilized country on earth. The number of Oxford Bibles thus circulated with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD aggregate a total of 135,000. Many hundred thousands more have been circulated since, however, for at this time Dr. Klopsch conceived the idea of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Red-Letter Bible, now in universal use, with every word recorded therein as having been spoken by our Lord printed in red. Other thousands of Bibles have been circulated gratuitously, as a part of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S evangelical work in the various fields of Christian service.

And so the Old Book itself became the vehicle whereby THE CHRISTIAN HERALD rose from an obscure journalistic station to world-wide renown. Few publications, indeed, have been favored with a growth so truly marvelous; and it has been the high privilege of no other periodical in the entire world to exert a similarly powerful Christianizing influence in its own upbuilding.

This marked the turning-point in the material affairs of the fledgling journal, till then a struggling weekly of comparatively feeble circulation. It also marked the turning-point in the life of Dr. Klopsch, master philanthropist, whose name has since become permanently endeared in the hearts and memories of a loving, world-wide constituency. Just prior to the offer of the Oxford Teacher's Bible, Dr. Klopsch, then an ardent young journalist and religious worker, leased THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from the original founder and owner, the Rev. Michael Baxter, proprietor of the English Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times, who fourteen years previously furnished the funds with which to start the American edition in the little upper room of the Bible House. Shortly afterward Dr. Klopsch bought the property outright.

Immediately plans of the new management began to broaden out in closer accord with Dr. Klopsch's own ideas and American journalistic standards. The Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, whose contributions had, from the very first issue, struck a popular chord all over America and abroad, was secured as editor. Since Dr. Talmage's office was largely that of a contributing editor, however, the actual routine editing continued under the immediate supervision of Dr. B. J. Fernie, who had served in this capacity since the establishment of the paper by the Rev. Mr. Baxter. Three months after the change of management, Dr. Fernie was made associate editor in collaboration with Dr. George H. Sandison, who joined the Klopsch organization at that time as managing editor. Of the original staff, Dr. Sandison, the present editor, now in the twenty-third year of his administration, is yet alive and active in the work.

DR. GEO. H. SANDISON

Editor of The Christian Herald

From this period onward the real development of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD began. In the first few years it had reflected a good many of the journalistic tendencies of its British antecedent, both in form and in editorial bearing. It was too apathetic, too un-American. Dr. Klopsch early appreciated this condition; and so he set about improving THE CHRISTIAN HERALD physically as well as in editorial content. Being one of the first to realize quite fully the value of pictorial journalism, and the tremendous possibilities of color printing, he began to utilize these agencies to the end of making THE CHRISTIAN HERALD brighter, more attractive and more artistically beautiful. Fired with the enthusiasm and zeal of the man who has found his life-work, and possessed of a rare combination of business and literary faculties, he was particularly well qualified to follow up the advantage that had come to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through his first ingenious efforts in securing new readers. At once radical and conservative in his methods, he was a close observer of the popular trend in journalism, and yet appreciative of all that time had definitely standardized. His keen mind foresaw the great possibilities that awaited a journal conducted on up-to-date lines while adhering faithfully to the vital principles of Christianity, yet sufficiently broad to be acceptable to all denominations. This was his plan. Results have shown how well he carried it out.

Established as a religious newspaper, with certain precedents before it that had been set by other like publications both at home and abroad, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD early departed from the beaten path. Not satisfied with being simply a periodical religious journal, however efficacious as such, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD started in to exercise the talent that had been given it; and so markedly successful were its endeavors from the very first that in a brief span of years it grew to a position of world-wide prestige and eminence, with a ministry of its own.

The theme of this visualization is especially close to the hearts of the "Old Guard," who constitute the bulwark of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. The events thus called to mind form a kaleidoscopic picture which, in its realism to those who made these works possible, is probably not surpassed in all history or romance. Northward to Labrador, south to Africa and Australia, west to China and Japan, and east to Burma and India—radiating from a common center in the homeland—the bridges of help have been built, reaching out across mountains and oceans to every habitable land.

Millions to Charity

Having given itself over to the spreading of the Gospel at home and abroad and to the furtherance of deserving charities in all parts of the world, it quickly became the acknowledged channel through which benevolently disposed Americans not only gave a valuable momentum to missionary work in many fields, but distributed alms and relief in those countries that from time to time have come under the harrow of affliction and widespread suffering—through war, plague, famine, flood, earthquake or other cause.

To quote from a December issue in 1894, "it seems to have been divinely led into a field of philanthropy so wide and so far-reaching as to impress the sympathy and co-operation of its readers in every clime. In the special field of charity, $120,000 has been expended in the aggregate. In the line of distinctly religious work, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S efforts have been signally blessed. Its expenditures in the various fields of Christian effort altogether aggregate a total of $530,000, or upward of $105,000 a year." This statement was printed nineteen years ago. From that date unto the present day THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as the nominal representative of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, has steadily augmented these former efforts, until the grand total now aggregates nearly four millions of dollars. Most of this vast sum has been contributed within the last ten years.

The available space in a single issue would not suffice for an itemized chronology of all the minor and individual philanthropies, for they are legion. And as these matters are already familiar chapters to most of our readers, it will serve present purposes to review briefly the more significant ones.

A "Bird's-eye View" of the Christian Herald Charities

A bird's-eye view of the world-wide scope of the CHRISTIAN HERALD charities may be had from a glance at the accompanying map of the world (opposite page) with the many lines of continuity reaching out from the Bible House in New York City to practically every habitable corner of the globe. It is truly inspiring to think what all these lines represent. In many instances they signify relief to starving thousands; again, succor to persecuted men and women and little children, trodden under the brute heel of oppression. One dot on the map may indicate the post of a lone missionary, laboring single-handed among the heathen jungle people of the Dark Continent, or it may represent some central point from which hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of food, clothing, and other life-necessities have been dispensed. The memory quickens at the unforgettable scenes and events, once graphically transmitted through these pages, that are thus called to mind.

The map has been supplemented by a tabulation of figures showing the exact amounts contributed toward each charity and philanthropy listed, up to May 31 of the present year. But space limitations preclude a full list; and only the more important geographical locations are indicated on the map. Hundreds of minor interior stations are not given. Recently a member of the staff, while viewing the artist's original of the map here shown, made this remark: "In America alone I could call off to you enough places where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has extended actual succor or relief until that division of the map would be almost solidly red with lines."

In 1892 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent the food-laden steamer Leo to Russia, with a cargo of flour and medicines for the peasant sufferers in sixteen famine-stricken provinces. This charity was the means of saving thousands of lives. Similar expeditions were undertaken to Armenia (1896), when many American missionaries and officials co-operated; to Cuba (1898) when Dr. Klopsch was appointed by President McKinley as a member of the government commission for the relief of the starving reconcentrados; to India (1897 and 1900), when our readers contributed so liberally that two steamships, the City of Everett and the Quinto, were chartered by the United States Government and despatched with cargoes of breadstuffs, resulting in an immense saving of human lives during the great famine; to China (1901), when, with the co-operation of our American missionaries, famine-stricken Shansi was succored and saved; to Finland and Sweden (1903), when America's gifts saved thousands of starving Finns, Lapps, and Swedes—a work which, as will be remembered by the older members of the Family, received the warmest recognition from the king and royal princes of Norway and Sweden. In response to a public appeal by President Roosevelt, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD presented to its readers the cause of the famine sufferers in the northern provinces of Japan, and raised within a very few weeks a total of $250,000; in recognition of which achievement President Roosevelt sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the following telegram: "Let me heartily thank you . . . for the admirable work done in connection with the famine sufferers in Japan. . . . You have rendered a very real service to humanity and to the cause of international good-will." Next came the second call from China; and with the aid of the American Government, which placed two war transports at its disposal, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent over half a million dollars' worth of flour and cash to the starving people of that unhappy country. When the earthquake destroyed Messina and Calabria, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the co-operation of Queen Helena, expended through a period of several months $1,000 a day for bread and milk for the relief of widowed mothers and orphaned children. During 1909-1910 it sent 20,000 blankets, a large consignment of sewing machines and a cash remittance to Mexico, in aid of the Monterey flood sufferers. Recent contributions were the Ohio Flood Fund and the Balkan Fund, $43,871.

For many years our readers have supported 5,000 orphans in India, training and educating them to Christian manhood and womanhood. A similar work is now being done among the orphan children of China, Africa and Japan.

Domestic Philanthropies

The benevolences of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, however, have not been wholly expended in other lands than our own. In 1895 it came to the rescue of the famine-stricken farmers of Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado, to whom were sent train-loads of coal, food and clothing—this in addition to a large relief fund transmitted through home missionaries and State relief committees. In 1900 it sent help to the sufferers at Galveston, Texas, who were rendered destitute by the grat flood of that year.

For nineteen years THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has maintained the Bowery Mission in New York City, known as "the place where God makes crooked men straight." Here, besides giving the Gospel message to over 200,000 souls annually, are served, every winter morning, free breakfasts to over 2,000 homeless men forming the famous Midnight "Bread-Line." Its Free Labor Bureau has provided work for thousands of the worthy poor.

The CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn-on-the-Hudson, in nineteen years, has sheltered and cared for 37,545 boys and girls, poor child waifs of New York tenements. It now entertains nearly 3,000 children every summer.

The Christian Herald as a Factor in Civilization

While the external activities of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are centralized in the various fields of charitable and philanthropic endeavor, its ministry proper is of a much broader scope—embracing all manner of evangelical Christian work, home and foreign missions, rescue missions, Sunday school work, Bible distribution, relief work, etc. There probably has been no prominent Gospel or humanitarian enterprise within the past twenty years, in any part of the world, of which it has not borne an important part. The Scriptural invocation reads: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature," and this it strives to do, consistently and without regard to lines of color, creed, or race.

Whenever a campaign is contemplated, the only questions asked are: "Is the work needed?" and "Shall we do it?" The answers proving satisfactory, the cause of the work is then presented to our subscribers and they, the voters in this great spiritual democracy of nearly two million souls, are the arbiters in every case.

An Ally of the Government

In much of its relief work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has enjoyed hearty co-operation from the United States Government under several successive administrations. Large steamships for the transportation of foodstuffs to China and India, and wherever else needed, have been supplied by the Navy Department without charge. On one occasion the English Government placed at its disposal ships for the transportation of supplies to India, but a similar arrangement had already been made with our own government. In every large benevolent undertaking it has worked hand in hand with the rulers of our own and other countries.

The effect of all this has been to promote and sustain a solid international good-will and to impress other nations of the earth with the bountiful generosity of our American people. The fellow-feeling engendered has been lasting. To-day in Japan, Italy, Russia, India, China, Finland, Norway, Sweden, Turkey, Armenia, Greece, the Balkans and elsewhere, the attitude of the various governments toward this nation has been measurably affected by the former and recent good offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in times of distress and suffering. Naturally this condition has been of great help in establishing better commercial relations with the above-named countries.

Thus it will be observed that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stands to-day as one of the really potential agencies in the universal movement for world-wide peace. And in this respect, being unfettered by ties of government or by diplomatic interrelations, it occupies a conspicuous and unique position before the world: a free moral and spiritual agent in the service of God and man.

In editorial scope the broad, evangelical policies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are again manifest. The same principles and qualities that have won it esteem among all Christian denominations are recurrently reflected in the writings of its leading contributors.

Nor has it restricted the hospitality of its columns to writers of a purely ecclesiastical bent. Some of the foremost writers of secular books and stories are introduced from time to time, and many of them have become regular contributors. Of course, there has been exercised a wise discrimination in the selection of such writers, and the best interests of the individual reader have ever been the guide. The literary and editorial quality of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be best described, in three words, as wholesome, helpful, and inspiring. It has been the editorial aim to strengthen the ideals and minister to the daily needs of every reader, moral, spiritual, and intellectual — not merely to supply pleasant reading—and to create a proper environment in the home. The line of demarcation between a real institution of service and a mere publishing enterprise is nowhere more clearly drawn than in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The present administration is carrying out in fullest sympathy and with great vigor the same steadfast policies that have molded the paper's course of usefulness for the past two decades. On the editorial, managerial, and contributing staffs of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are members of practically every Christian denomination, and its corps of correspondents, including some 200 workers in many fields throughout the world, is also broadly representative.

Some of the Builders

It would be futile to begin here a list of all those who, as contributors, have helped in the upbuilding of this institution. Such a list might occupy several pages and still be incomplete. There are, however, certain names so intimately associated with its growth and history that we are constrained to print the following list, imperfect as it must necessarily be.

Among the contributing editors appear the names of many of the most famous divines in America and Europe, including Dr. T. DeWitt Talmage, celebrated pastor of the Brooklyn Tabernacle; Rev. Charles Haddon Spurgeon, of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London; Rev. Dr. R. S. MacArthur, New York; Rev. George A. Gordon, of Boston; Dwight L. Moody; Rev. J. B. Hawthorne, Atlanta, Ga.; Rev. George C. Lorimer, and many others whose eloquence, and whose sound, wholesome theology is everywhere known and appreciated. Among the following personalities in the realm of religion and letters will be noted some of the most widely read authors of our time, many of whom are yet

100 Pages of Facts and Figures

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ALMANAC is a handy manual of the very information you need from day to day. Once in the habit of consulting it, you will do so often and conveniently, for not only are there "Contents and Index" which will enable you to turn instantly to any subject on any page, but the book itself has a hole punched through the upper left-hand corner so that you may hang it by the fireplace, in the library, or any other place where you may most handily reach it.

FREE To Yearly Subscribers

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ALMANAC for 1914 has been compiled with the definite object of supplying information in concise form on subjects which are difficult to locate. The calendar is there, of course, and added to that department this year is a full treatment of the astronomical phenomena and the story of our planetary family of 1914 from the authoritative pen of Berlin H. Wright. Coupled with the calendar will be found a record of the most important events of 1913.

The returns of the United States Government Census Bureau have been called upon for full and accurate information on our national Agriculture and Animal Industries, on Irrigation, Mining and Manufacturing. Direct from the Government Bureaus have come the statistics on our population, its origin, its distribution, etc.

Progress of Religion

The statistics and general information regarding the denominational divisions and sub-divisions of American Christianity have been revised and brought up to date. This section of the Almanac is a complete and reliable statement of the present standing of the denominations, made by their duly appointed officers.

Almost every denomination shows progress for the past year, and that progress is here set forth in figures and concise statements that cover the subjects thoroughly in the briefest and most useful fashion.

Other Features

In other sections of the Almanac will be found full statements of the Government of the United States and its possessions; the Judiciary of our nation and the governments of our near neighbors under the British flag. The new Tariff Law and its income features are fully defined.

Summaries of the Marriage Laws, the Inheritance Taxes and other important phases of State sovereignty are presented.

Such an able advocate as JANE ADDAMS tells Why Women Should Vote, while SENATOR ELIHU ROOT, MRS. FRANCIS MARCOE SCOTT and MRS. BARCLAY HOWARD support the opposing side of the modern argument. Also in women's realm are the sections on Beautifying the Home, Hints Toward Health, The Flower Garden and The Modern Girl.

Just Some Headings

This space will not permit a further detailed statement, so here are a few of the other subjects treated: Great Celebrations for 1914; Postal Savings Banks; the Good Roads Movement, Capital Punishment; the Carnegie Foundation; Post Office Regulations; Carnegie Institute; Light; Our Nation's Health; Passports; National Educational Institutions; Divorce; Potential Vote of the United States; and scores more.

Then, beside all that, there are fiction stories and fun stories and cartoons and jokes, and some of the best poetry written during 1913.

My Garden of Hearts

By Margaret E. Sangster

The announcement of a book by an author so widely known and greatly loved as Mrs. Sangster is an event in the literary world.

My Garden of Hearts contains over sixty complete stories and a number of charming sketches. In these tales the author has dealt in her own delightful way with the romance and sentiment of life in city and country, among the rich and the poor, the cultured and the simple, and through it all she has woven the golden thread of love, and lighted it with the sunshine of a cheerful and optimistic philosophy. Her Garden of Hearts is fragrant with kind deeds, with noble sacrifices, with tender sentiment and brave resolutions, and the people one meets there are such as we love to become acquainted with. The reader seems to move in an atmosphere of old-fashioned gardens, blossoming orchards, ripening hayfields and fragrant woodlands. All her stories, whether the action be indoors or in the open, are "near to nature," and her characters are for the most part men and women loyal and lovable, with a purpose in life that makes it worth while. They are capital stories, that will fill many a leisure hour with pleasure and profit.

100 Wonder Tales

By Dr. Francis Trevelyan Miller

Author of "American Hero Tales"

Here is a book with a thrill in it—a thrill of awe, of admiration, of wonderment, of patriotism.

How would you like to see the oceans rush together? To climb rays of light into the stars? To throw your voice across a continent? To walk on the bottom of the seas? To spend a few days in the bowels of the earth? To ride on the winds from country to country? These and other sensations are described in this book of marvels.

How Many of These Questions Can You Answer?

What is the name of the man who created the boat that ushered in the age of steam navigation?

Who is the American woman who discovered a comet and was given a medal by a king?

Who was the farmer's son who, inspired by a bird cage and a hearth brush, invented the cotton gin?

Who was the bankrupt storekeeper who worked in a debtor's prison, and plucked the secret of rubber-making from a rubbish-heap?

Who was the starving artist who gave up his pictures for science and invented the telegraph?

These questions, and scores of others equally fascinating, are answered in this interesting volume of Wonder Tales.

The volume is full of the stories of men who have created wonderful things—stories of women who have solved the secrets of earth—stories of boys who have struggled and become famous—stories of girls whose hands have made this world more beautiful.

Every word of them is true; yet they compose a volume of romance, history and biography that epitomizes the whole progress of American heroism, invention and genius.

A LITTLE SET OF WONDERFUL BOOKS FREE FOR EVERY NEW SUBSCRIBER

"THE FUNDAMENTALS OF THE FAITH"

FOR two or three years past, little volumes, about pocket-size, have been coming at intervals to the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through the mail from Chicago. Each volume bore the general title of

"The Fundamentals"

The editor was surprised and delighted with the little volumes, which were filled with articles of great force and ability, written by some of the ablest expositors of the Christian faith now living. Every book of the ten was a new and delightful surprise, and the whole set, taken together, and placed in the hands of a reader of average intelligence, was almost the equivalent of a Theological Course in a University.

When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD learned that these wonderful little volumes were produced through the liberality of two Christian laymen, who had set apart a fund to print and circulate them among pastors and teachers, it was decided that, if possible, the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should have an opportunity to possess sets of these precious little books. Accordingly, through the kind co-operation of Dr. R. A. Torrey (Dwight L. Moody's long-time Gospel associate), an arrangement was completed by which The Fundamentals are to be supplied to us in any quantities desired, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD pledging itself to make no profit on The Fundamentals but to sell them at cost of publication and expressage with renewal or new subscriptions.

This arrangement being satisfactorily completed, we are now enabled to announce that any subscriber sending in his or her own renewal, and desiring to secure a set of the ten precious volumes of The Fundamentals, may do so by accepting the offer outlined in the last paragraph of this article.

Right here, the interested reader will very properly pause to ask:

"What are The Fundamentals?"

We answer, with emphasis, that they are the ablest, wisest, clearest and most convincing exposition of the foundation truths of the Christian faith that has ever been prepared by consecrated modern scholarship, and which is now presented to the world in a form which all can understand.

In this age of unrestrained religious freedom, with its allurements and specious cults, false doctrines and skepticism, both open and disguised, it is of the highest importance that the foundation principles should be clearly understood by those who profess Christianity. To meet this universal need the best consecrated scholarship of our day has been enlisted in the preparation of a series of booklets dealing with "The Fundamentals." They are accurate, enlightening, and conclusive. They deal with vital facts in the history, doctrine and development of the Christian Church and they present the belief of that church to-day in clear and simple language.

With The Fundamentals at hand, one may become familiar with almost every great question affecting the modern church; may inform himself concerning disputed points. It has been well said that these ten little volumes—each small enough to be put in one's coat pocket—are a spiritual armament for the defense of the faith, and a priceless treasury for the Bible student and teacher and the man and woman in everyday life.

Below we give the names of a few of the long list of famous Christian scholars who write for The Fundamentals, and the titles of their contributions:

IF YOU KNEW

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

ONCE, not long ago, a friend of mine came to call on me. Her pretty eyes were red and her lips trembled as she talked; she had a great sorrow in her ing little heart. All at once it came nbling out:

'Did you ever know Jack Carson?" e asked.

"Not at all well," I answered, "only bow to on the street. I hear that he very ill."

The girl gulped back a sob before e answered.

"He died this morning," she told me. Nobody thought that he would. We d a quarrel almost a month ago, and e hadn't even been speaking—" Her ice broke suddenly and she groped r my hand. Hands are comforting ings.

"Oh! If I had only known!"

The cry is world-old and infinitely peless. For so many things would ever happen if we had only known.

A poem was sent to me a few days go—a poem too long to print here. ut the story is very simple. It is the y of a girl who is calling through ie great empty world for her lover to eturn to her. And each verse ends ith the refrain:

"Would you come if you only knew?"

With the poem came a letter which old me of a pathetic little love affair. t was the story of a girl who had nown a boy through all the days of er life. She had gone to school with im, and to college. And she had rown to love him. But somehow, hrough an unkind fate, they had beome separated, and though the girl vas sure that her affection had been eturned, convention would not let her peak of it. But she wonders—oh, so athetically!—what he would have one if he had known.

It seems hardly necessary to wonder. f the man loved her, nothing would ave kept him away. But he probably hought: "She doesn't love me. How ould she? She doesn't want to see me, r talk to me."

There must be hundreds of little nisunderstandings like this; yes, housands of them.

Of course, a great many things: modesty, bashfulness and the tradition of many generations will keep a girl from telling a man that she likes to have him call, or that she cares for him. It is the man's part to ask the girl, if he likes her well enough. But it is downright foolishness for two people who care for each other to sigh and worry with many weary miles between them.

I wonder if you have ever heard of mental telepathy? But of course you have! Some people call it coincidence, and some call it intuition. But I think that a great deal of it is love.

I once heard the true story of a girl who was engaged to a sea captain. He was going on a long voyage around the world, and his fiancée was perhaps a little nervous about the dangers of the trip. One particularly dark and stormy night, when the lightning flashed and the thunder roared in the distance, she was especially worried. She thought of the vessel—very tiny in the midst of a large ocean—and she thought of the man she loved, on the tossing sea. There was nothing she could do but pray, and so she got down on her knees and asked God to protect him.

In a few weeks the man's ship landed, and he hurried to the girl's home. Almost as soon as he saw her, he exclaimed:

"The queerest thing happened week before last—it worried me a little. There was a terrible storm going on, and I was lying in my cabin trying to sleep. But the harder the boat tossed, the more I thought of you, and then suddenly a particularly bright flash of lightning brightened up the room, and I thought you were standing near me, while I looked at you speechless with astonishment. The light died away, and I thought there in the darkness that you kissed me and said 'God is taking care of you!'"

Who shall say that his comforting assurance was not an answer to the girl's prayer? They knew that they loved each other—knew it so well that miles of stormy sea could not separate their thoughts or their hearts.

In one of Kipling's poems, an old Persian is giving his son good advice on many subjects. One verse goes like this:

In public her face turneth to thee, and pleasant her smile when ye meet.
It is ill. The cold rocks of El-Gider smile thus on the waves at their feet.
In public her face is averted, with anger she nameth thy name.
It is well. Was there ever a loser content with the loss of the game?

The old Persian was right. Very often a girl is seemingly unkind to a man simply because she does not want him to see just how much she does like him. On the other hand, a girl may be gracious and friendly and even charming to a man that she does not care two sticks about. If we only knew!

It seems to me that we should make it our business to know. Not only in the matter of "heart affairs," which my little correspondent asked me to write about, but in our home life, and our school life, and in our business. If you want to say something or do something, think ever so carefully for a while and you may change your mind. When things go wrong at home, don't quarrel with your family or say mean things about your friends. When you have to make a trying decision in every-day life, be very, very careful to know just what you are doing. If you like some people, don't take it for granted that they are mind-readers; tell them so; and tell them quickly, because, even though the day may be full of sunshine, and flowers, and joy, nobody can tell what to-morrow will be like. The hard words, or thoughtless acts of to-day may be very hard to forget in the future.

Oh, friends of mine, remember this one thing, and never forget it: The very saddest, most hopeless thing in the world is just one tiny sentence:

"If I had only known!"

AMONG THE WORKERS

—EVANGELIST J. M. BURWICK and Gospel singer George Crane will be fellow workers in the evangelistic field this winter, with headquarters at Two Harbors, Minn.

—AS A RESULT of a series of meetings held in the Congregational Church at West Glover, Vt., recently by Evangelist Lewis E. Smith, the pastor on the Sunday following the services took into the church twenty-eight on confession of faith and one by letter. This is a scattered farming section of the State.

—WILFRED T. GRENFELL, of the Labrador Deep Sea Mission, writes from St. Anthony, N. F.: "I want to tell you how greatly our people appreciate the copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which you so kindly send us. They go from hand to hand till they look—as I occasionally see them—very dilapidated messengers of the Gospel of God's love. Our very sincerest thanks go out to you for all your very material help."

—THE BEAUTIFUL work of the May Tewksbury Mission at Columbus, Ga., is being successfully continued under the management of Mrs. S. P. Tewksbury, mother of the young girl in whose memory the mission was established. The mission is conducted for the boys and girls of the city who are too poor to attend school. Most of them are "dinner-toters," employed for a few hours each day in carrying dinners to the operators in the mills, at a stipend of fifty cents a week. Many young lives have received instruction and inspiration at the May Tewksbury Mission and have become useful members of society. The work is undenominational. Those interested in it are invited to communicate with Mrs. S. P. Tewksbury, 3204 Second Avenue, Columbus, Ga.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

continues no one in the group assembled there will ever forget the look on Martha's face.

She was a girl whose physical beauty had long ago been beaten out of her face by the bloody fist of brutal passion. But there had come to her after her redemption something infinitely more lovely than fleshly attraction. As she stood there in the opening between the curtains that parted the alcove, the look on her face was supreme in its glory of unearthly pallor and superhuman exaltation. She stepped into the room. Mr. Maxwell had faced her, as he was nearest, and Martha said, not brokenly, but clearly,

"Jesus is here!"

"Here!" Mr. Maxwell spoke from lips that whispered.

"He is come to earth again! I have seen him!"

No one in the room stirred or spoke. Martha stood, her face glowing, her eyes fixed on Mr. Maxwell. No one knew how much time had passed when he said with what sounded like unearthly calmness:

"Where did you see him, Martha?"

"At our church—to-night."

Again a silence, deep, uncounted, unmeasured. The little company took no account of time. Every eye was fixed on Martha. The girl seemed calm, and at the same time there was that on her countenance that spoke of profoundest tumults.

"Yes, Jesus is here!" she repeated in a tone so low, with an ecstasy so thrilling that the group leaning forward in measureless excitement seemed to feel a tension break, and the next moment a tumult of questions might have poured about Martha, if Mr. Maxwell, his face white and a new look in his eyes, had not turned and said, "Wait! Let Martha speak. Tell us—what you—have—seen and heard—Martha."

Slowly, as if oppressed and almost stunned, but with clear and growing eagerness, Martha began to speak. But she had not said more than a few sentences before every one was crowding up near her, asking questions, pleading for answers, bewildering her with their demands to know—and yet not one of them caught even the faintest glimmer, not even Mr. Maxwell, of the stupendous events that were to follow Martha's story, nor could they grasp the astounding fact even in the faintest degree that they were about to enter upon a succession of great experiences that would create new history for mankind, and make the heart of the world beat as it had not throbbed for nearly two thousand years.

CHAPTER II

THE torrent of questions which the assembled company poured upon Martha bewildered and confused her. She stood near the place where she had stopped when she entered the library and looked appealingly at Mr. Maxwell.

"I can't answer all these questions at once," she said slowly. "Mr. Maxwell, I maybe can't answer some of them at all. You ask me one at a time. Perhaps I can tell something."

The girl was trembling with intense excitement, and Mr. Maxwell, who was the calmest person in the room now, noticed it, and said:

"Sit down, Martha. We will all be seated. If what Martha says is true—it—does not seem possible—but—"

He put his hands over his face and tried to control his growing agitation. By an effort he succeeded in calming himself, and as if by common consent, after a moment of silence which seemed all the more strange following that sudden outburst of eager questions, the company was still, while Mr. Maxwell put their questions to Martha. The girl sat now with her hands folded, her eyes looking at Mr. Maxwell with deep seriousness and a quiet assurance in her answers that caused her eager listeners greater feeling than the noisiest assertions.

"What happened first?"

"He appeared right in the middle of our meeting and spoke to us."

"How did he appear? What did he look like?"

"I didn't notice him come in. He just was there."

"What did he look like?"

Martha was naturally a slow girl in her speech. Mrs. Maxwell sometimes said it was her one fault. In reality it was not a fault; it was simply a habit that went with her phlegmatic character. She seemed, however, to the intensely eager listeners around her to be unusually slow in answering this question.

"I don't believe I can tell."

"You can't tell how he looked? But you saw him and you are sure he was Jesus?"

"I only know how he looked." Martha spoke with painful slowness. "He looked just like a common man, and at the same time different."

"What did he say?" Mr. Maxwell asked, thinking best to come back to the other question later.

"He comforted us," said Martha so simply that a deep silence followed.

"But what did he say?"

"He said how glad he was to know about our church, and he praised all the good it was doing. And he mentioned the First Church, and spoke your name, Mr. Maxwell, and a lot of other names in First Church—Mrs. Maxwell, and Mrs. Page, and Mrs. Clyde and Mr. Clyde, and Miss Virginia and the new assistant, Mr. —"

"Stanton," said Mr. Maxwell, while his eyes glowed.

"Yes, Mr. Stanton. He seemed to know all of you. And Mr. Norman and Mr. Powers. He said beautiful words about all of you. He didn't blame the church for anything. Just praised its great work."

There was another period of silence in the library, while Martha sat looking wistfully at Mr. Maxwell.

"And what else?"

"What else?"

"What else did he do? What else did he say?"

"That was about all."

"And you can't tell us how he looked?"

"No, sir. Not very well. I don't think I thought of it."

"But how do you know the person you saw was Jesus? Did he do any miracles?"

"Miracles?"

"Yes. Wonderful works. How did he try to prove he was Jesus? How do you know it?"

Over Martha's face an astonishing look passed. It was reminiscent of her troubled life before she came to Mrs. Maxwell's. And then she said very slowly,

"After the meeting, Jesus spoke to me, and told me things about my life in Chicago ten years ago. And he mentioned Loreen. He said he knew her."

Virginia broke out with a cry as she stretched her hands toward Martha.

"He mentioned Loreen!"

"He did, Miss Page, and he said she was happy where she was."

Again that tense silence fell over the company, smitten into awed stillness by Martha's simple but tremendous statement.

"But some stranger might have found out the facts about you and Loreen. How do you know—"

"But no stranger could tell me about things that no one but myself ever knew. Mr. Maxwell, he told me in a few words all about my real sinful life—things I have never told, not even to Mrs. Maxwell."

"And you feel sure he—this person—was really—Jesus?"

"JESUS IS HERE!"

"I know it."

"How did the rest feel? What impression did this person make on the other people at the meeting?"

"They all felt as I did. Mr. Maxwell, when you see him, you will feel just as I did. You cannot doubt. No one can doubt."

Again a period of silence. The whole thing was so stupendous, if it was true, that their hearts and minds could not grasp it, and their very speech was smitten into silence.

"Where is he—this person—now? Where did he go after the meeting?"

"He went home with Mr. Grey."

"He is with Mr. Grey now?"

"I suppose so. Mr. Grey invited him to come with him and they went away together."

Edward Norman's old reportorial instincts came to the front.

"Call up Grey over the phone and ask him—"

"Yes. I'll do that in a minute," Mr. Maxwell said, "but I want to ask Martha a few more questions. Can't you tell us, Martha, how he looked?"

"No, I don't believe I can, Mr. Maxwell. He looked to me just like an average man, only different."

" 'An average man, only different,' " murmured Stanton, and even his low tone was deep and penetrating. "Why should he look any other? Why should we expect to see a face like those painted by stereotyped art, when we know well enough there is no authentic portrait of Jesus in existence?"

"That is what the world will expect to see," said Virginia. "It has had a certain type of face presented by art for so long that it will expect to see some such countenance as that painted by the old masters."

"It is all incomprehensible to me," said Maxwell. "But what does all that mean if Jesus is here? That is the main thing after all. Martha," he turned again toward her, as if he felt there must be something else the girl had not told, something she was keeping back without meaning to conceal any real facts—"Martha. did this person say who he was? Did he call himself Jesus?"

Martha leaned forward eagerly.

"Yes. He said two or three times like this: 'I am Jesus. I have come to visit the earth again. I have come to comfort my disciples and help on my kingdom.' Like that! And it all seemed so good. Oh, I cannot express it."

Again, as so many times that evening, a deep silence settled over the little company, trying to measure something immeasurable.

"And did he say anything about the length of his stay, or his plans?"

"No, I don't remember that he did."

"Did he say anything to the people in the meeting about not making him known?"

"Not that I heard. He talked as freely and openly as any one could."

"What was the one thing that impressed you most about him, Martha?"

"I think it was his great joy and his air of victory."

Again the silence stole over all the little company. Mr. Maxwell broke it by turning to Mr. Norman.

"Edward," he said, using Norman's first name as he had been doing for several years, "I'll call up Grey, and you question Martha about anything else you have in mind that I have forgotten."

He went over to the telephone, which was in the hallway, and called up the pastor of the Rectangle Church. Mr. Norman did not try to ask Martha any questions, and, as if with one consent, every one was listening to the one-sided talk over the telephone.

"Yes. I'm glad to hear your voice, Grey. We have just been talking with Martha, our girl here, you know. She—"

"Of course we can't believe it. You say—what?"

"You really believe it—yourself?"

"Asleep? Now? At your house?"

"Can you come over? Norman is here—and Rachel and Virginia, and the regular company, and Stanton has come in."

"In about half an hour? All right. We can hardly wait to see you."

Mr. Maxwell hung up the receiver and came back into the library. The profound seriousness of his face had deepened.

"Grey says he has no doubt whatever. I had hardly spoken his name before he said, 'Jesus is here!' Actually in his own house, asleep there. Can we comprehend that?"

"Only," said Stanton, whom every one was fast beginning to like for his fine combination of poet and man of action, "only, of course, when he was here before, he slept in common people's houses, and wore common clothes and ate common food and was a practical carpenter. Why should we expect anything different now he has come again?"

"Do you accept it as a fact that he has actually come again?" Mr. Maxwell put the question as if he was afraid Stanton would say no.

"I would be as willing to take Martha's evidence as any one's. Can any one say it is impossible for Jesus to live on the earth again?"

"Not impossible but improbable," said Stephen Clyde.

"And why improbable? Has it not seemed to all of us in the last ten years as if the whole world was on the very eve of tremendous happenings in the church, and in the social, business and commercial and political life of the people? Why, it has been almost like a spoken word of God every day. I do not find myself stunned at the thought of Jesus being here. Somehow it does not seem unnatural. It seems opportune. He is needed here now."

"I have had the same feeling," Mr. Maxwell spoke eagerly. "I have not been able to shut my mind to the vision of his possible coming. The need is great. But the thought of his being here in actual person terrifies me. What will he say? What will he do? What judgment will he pass on the church and the ministry?"

"Martha said he did not say a word of censure. It was all praise of the church. Didn't you say so, Martha?" asked Mr. Maxwell.

"He comforted us," Martha repeated like a child her former statement. "After he was through talking, I never felt so proud of being a church member. It seemed to me he mentioned every good thing we had ever done and told us how it gladdened his heart."

"Didn't he say anything about the hypocrites in the church?" Powers asked.

"He did not condemn any one. He spoke every word in the spirit of love."

"And you can't tell us how he looked?" Mr. Maxwell persisted.

"No, Mr. Maxwell, I really can't Have you never met people you could not describe?"

Mr. Maxwell could not help smiling at Martha's earnestness. The company continued to ask her questions, going over the entire scene in the mission church again while waiting for Mr. Grey.

At last they heard his step on the porch, and Mr. Maxwell opened the door before he could ring the bell, and Grey came into the library.

SENSE AND NONSENSE

CONDUCTED BY JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE

JOSIAH EATS SOME GOOD APPLES

HOW prone we mortals are to neglect the comfort and happiness that is within our reach and look forward to some shinin' goal that like as not we will never attain to and set down on.

When the mother holds her pretty dimpled baby boy in her arms and she looks past the rosy and laughin' sweetness of the child and sets the eyes of her aspirin' mind upon the time when he will be a tall, stately man, and President of the U. S., or hold some other high position. When, if she only knew it, the circle of her lovin' embrace is probably the proudest and safest position he will ever hold, and she is now enjoyin' with him in her arms the happiest and most care-free time of her life.

Marietta Holley
Author of Samantha at Coney Island

The school boy, lookin' forward to the Saturday treat, oh, how slowly the wheels of time roll along. How he slights the settled comfort of the present and lets his mind gloat on the bliss that will be his on his longed-for holiday. When more than as like as not the fish won't bite, or the nut tree be already rifled of its fruit, or the water in the swimmin' pool be too cold. Or else the sun will beat down too burnin' hot on his sunburnt back, or the boys will hide his clothes. Or mebby tempt him into some wild prank to be settled for in the woodshed, by the aid of an incensed parent and a strap.

When the lover slips the diamond ring on the third finger of his sweetheart, he longs for the time when he will place the plain gold band above it. Slightin' the present happiness, longin' for the future blessedness, when, like as not, the first new brightness will not be worn from the shinin' circlet when it will be cast aside, with love and loyalty, and from the dreary divorce court he will look back upon those hours of first love as upon a paradise he didn't half appreciate.

Now, all that sounds very pes'mistic and not a t'all like my usu'l reminissin', and p'raps it ain't as bad as that, anyway. Them may be rare cases, but they'll do to show us how we all look into the future as holdin' something more dear and beautiful than anything we have ever known. And how we hope to reach the golden treasure at the foot of the rainbow, that seems so near. But as we move forward, so duz the shinin' rainbow, and seems as fur away from us as ever.

This long episode took place in my mind, caused by a incident in which my beloved companion took a prominent part last evening. He loves apples dearly, and I encourage him in eating 'em, because we'v got plenty of 'em and they're good for his liver.

But when I told him this, he said in a real cross axent, "I don't take apples for medicine, Samantha, like cod-liver oil or wormwood. I shall eat apples, liver or no liver."

He don't look forward or lay plans ahead to make things come out right, so much as I do. I guess it is nateral for wimmen to be kinder savin' and equinomical. I spoze the trait descended onto 'em from prudent, equinomical four-mothers. So last evenin' when I see Josiah take a two-quart basin and lantern, and start for the cellar for the first time this fall after some apples to eat, I sez:

"Josiah, you bring up the specked ones, they are jest as good to eat after you cut the specks out."

He turned round with his basin and lantern in hand, and faced me with such a injured and indignant look on his linement that I dropped my knittin' in my lap in surprise, and sez he:

"Not if I know myself, I won't bring up any specked apples."

And I sez, "Why, Josiah, why won't you?"

"You kep' me eatin' rotten apples all last winter, Samantha Allen, and you can't make me begin agin this winter. Every time I went down cellar after apples to eat you'd holler: 'You take the specked ones, Josiah!' And I wuz jest fool enough to do it, and the apples rotted jest as fast as I eat, so I kep' jest even with 'em, and I never eat a good, sound apple all winter. Now, I'm goin' to eat good apples this winter, and if you want to eat the specked ones I hain't a-goin' to hender you."

Ch, what a scornful emphasis he put on that word "specked!" His voice wuz almost alarmin'; it wuz so loud and vehement and had such a injured, obstinate ring to it.

And I didn't bandy any more words with him, I couldn't, anyway, for by the time I had collected my mind together, I hearn him down to the bin.

And I d'no as I blamed him, come to put the subject before me as he did But I couldn't help allegorin' a good deal, as he sot enjoyin' his good apples.

MOTHER-HUNGER

IF I could only find her, for the mother-hunger's on me;
I want to see and touch her, to know her close beside:
I want to put my head in the hollow of her shoulder,
I want to feel her love me as she did before she died!

In all the world is nothing, love of husband or of children,
In all the world is nothing that can soothe me or can stir,
Like the memory of her fragile hand from which the ring was slipping—
The hand that wakes my longing at the very thought of her.

The window in the sunshine and the empty chair beside it,
The loneliness that mocks me as I find the sacred place—
O mother, is there naught in the unerring speech of silence
To let me know your presence, though I cannot see your face?

Oh, no, I've not forgotten the triumph and the glory—
I would not bring you back again to struggle and to pain;
This hour will pass; but oh, just now, the mother-hunger's on me—
And I would give the world to-night to kiss your hair again!

THE LORD OF THE LILIES

THE Master walked mid the lilies
At the close of a bitter day.
Like a singing breeze in the olive trees,
Passed a whisper on its way:
"He comes from the cruel city,
From the houses and hearts of stone.
With weary feet from the flinty street,
He comes once more to his own.

"Give of the balm that is hidden
In your secret caskets dim.
Bow lowly down to the hem of his gown;
Comfort, oh, comfort him!
Bathe his feet in your fragrance,
Bid his wee, weak sparrows sing,
As they fly apace to the trysting-place,
Where their Lord needs comforting.

"Oh, whiter than all the lilies
That have bloomed since the world began
Is the wonderful, shining spirit
That dwells in the Son of Man.
And sweeter than all the roses,
Sprung from an age-old sod,
Is that mighty heart for his creatures' part—
The heart of the Son of God.

"They have hated him in the city,
They have jeered at him all the day.
But bird and flower hail the blessed hour
When the Master walks their way.
So bring the balm and the fragrance
From your hidden caskets dim,
For the illies our Lord considered
Rejoice to consider him."

Stomach, Nerves and Thinker Restored by Grape-Nuts Food.

The number of persons whose ailments were such that no other food could be retained at all, is large and reports are on the increase.

"For 12 years I suffered from dyspepsia, finding no food that did not distress me," writes a Wis. lady. "I was reduced from 145 to 90 lbs., gradually growing weaker until I could leave my bed only a short while at a time, and became unable to speak aloud.

"Three years ago I was attracted by an article on Grape-Nuts and decided to try it.

"My stomach was so weak I could not take cream, but I used Grape-Nuts with milk and lime water. It helped me from the first, building up my system in a manner most astonishing to the friends who had thought my recovery impossible.

"Soon I was able to take Grape-Nuts and cream for breakfast and lunch at night, with an egg and Grape-Nuts for dinner.

"I am now able to eat fruit, meat and nearly all the vegetables for dinner, but fondly continue Grape-Nuts for breakfast and supper.

"At the time of beginning Grape-Nuts I could scarcely speak a sentence without changing words around or 'talking crooked' in some way, but I have become so strengthened that I no longer have that trouble." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason," and it is explained in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

THROUGH SUFFERING

GOD would never send you the darkness,
If he felt you could bear the light;
But you would not cling to his guiding hand
If the way were always bright;
And you would not care to walk by faith,
Could you always walk by sight.

'Tis true he has many an anguish
For your sorrowful heart to bear;
And many a cruel thorn crown
For your tired head to wear;
He knows how few would reach heaven at all
If pain did not guide them there.

You are tried in the blinding darkness
And the furnace of sevenfold heat;
'Tis the only way, believe me,
To keep you close to his feet.
For 'tis always so easy to wander,
When our lives are glad and sweet.

Then nestle your hand in your Father's,
And sing, if you can, as you go;
Your songs may cheer some one behind you,
Whose courage is sinking low.
And, well—if your lips do quiver,
God will love you better so.

ANNA LEVERING.

A Converted Thief's Offering

REV. CHARLES L. WALWORTH, D.D., of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., recently received a letter from a writer who styled himself a "Converted Crook," and enclosed $5.20 for the "conscience fund." He stated that the money represented the amount he had stolen from his mother when a boy, and she had entrusted to him her weekly contribution envelope for the Sunday school of the church. He wrote: "Some years ago I was a member of Trinity Sunday school. I had a good mother who sent me there, and as she was unable to go she used to send the envelope containing ten cents each week with me. Quite a few times the envelope never was received by the church. It has been nothing short of a miracle that I have kept out of prison since then. But God knew best. While walking on one of the streets of Poughkeepsie, my home city, God spoke to me, and like unto St. Paul I asked the question, 'Father, what wilt thou have me to do?' One thing God wants me to do is to return the stolen ten-cent pieces to Trinity Church, and I am enclosing $5.20, or 52 ten-cent pieces, for that year. I did not take that many, but can't remember the exact number, so will send the fifty-two to be sure. It matters not who this is who is writing, as God knows all about me, and that is enough for me. This example of a stricken conscience may do others good. A guilty soul has no rest until the guilt has been righted and God has given forgiveness."

Called Higher

Mrs. W. B. Essick (74) died at her home in Manley, Neb., September 2, 1913. She was a sincere, faithful, earnest Christian.

Mrs. Elizabeth Reaver (60), of Mount Olive, N. C., was called higher July 15, 1913. In her death the church and community lose the aid and influence of a noble woman whose heart was ever in the right.

"Joe" McDonald, founder of Joe's Mission, Springfield, Mass., was called to his reward August 4, 1913. The mission, which he founded at the time of his conversion, was closed at his death.

Mrs. Emily K. Black (86), of Ottawa, Ont., Canada, was called home July 28, 1913. She was a devout church member, and took an active interest in all church affairs until her feeble condition prevented her from further labors of service.

Jennie Wilson (57), of South Whitley, Ind., often spoken of as the "Fanny Crosby of the West," was called to her great reward, September 3, 1913. She blessed the world by writing over three thousand devotional hymns.

Mrs. Jane Buhrman, of Smithsburg, Md., was called higher July 16, 1913, in her seventy-first year. She was a faithful member of the Lutheran Church for more than half a century, and took great interest in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. John D. Main (77), of Hagerstown, Md., was called to her reward September 7, 1913. She was an active member of the church for sixty years, taught in the Sabbath school for fifty-nine years, having a class of thirty women at the time of her departure.

Rich and Poor

Both Enjoy This Luscious Oat Food at ½ Cent Per Dish

When children go without Quaker Oats in the morning, it is not on account of the cost.

Common oats cost the same price per package. They cost, like Quaker, one-half cent per dish.

It is because mothers don't know that Quaker Oats consists of the richest grains.

We pick them out—only ten pounds from a bushel—to get this matchless flavor.

We process them by heat for hours to keep the fullness of that flavor.

In these big grains—these mammoth flakes—lies all the enticement of oatmeal. It has made Quaker Oats the world's breakfast.

Quaker Oats

The Flavor That Won the World

You find Quaker Oats at the nearest store, and at a trifling price. But millions of mothers send thousands of miles to get what you find so handy.

Even Scotch mothers send here for their best oats. The British Isles consume more packages of Quaker than of all other brands together.

So in a hundred nations. It requires a billion dishes of Quaker Oats to supply a year's demand.

The reason is this:

Mothers now know that the children's good requires them to love oatmeal.

No other grain is so rich in phosphorus, none so rich in lecithin. And those are the elements of which brains and nerves are made.

As an energy food nothing compares with oats. To "feel one's oats," in every language, signifies vitality.

Mothers who know this, all the world over, are serving Quaker Oats. Not because of extra food value, but because of extra flavor. They want children to crave oatmeal.

You don't get this flavor in puny grains. But you always get it, at no extra price, when you call for Quaker Oats.

Regular Size package, 10c

Family size package for smaller cities and country trade, 25c.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

A GRATEFUL mother writes from Montana: "I look eagerly for the Answered Prayer Column, for I, too, have received so many answers and blessings from prayer. I have many 'stones of remembrance' to mark his goodness to me all along life's pathway." "He has been my very dearest Friend in time of affliction," writes Mrs. J. S. K., of Pottersville, N. Y. "I was in trouble and prayed to my heavenly Father and he rescued me." M. W. T. writes from Vancouver, Wash.: "The answers to my prayers have been nothing less than miracles."

W. H. C., of Denniston, Va., writes: "The Answered Prayer Column is impressive. I testify to the world that I get showers of blessing from the throne of God. God's Word and mercy seat are my fortress." M. B., of Malaga, Wash., writes: "God has answered many prayers for me. One was in securing work for my husband." Mrs. R. B. G. writes from Tacoma, Wash.: "I wish to acknowledge answers to prayer for my ten months old baby, who had bronchial pneumonia and was very sick for ten weeks." D. S. B., of Newark, Ohio, writes: "My mother, after a severe illness, has been restored to us. During the long, weary hours of waiting, it was such a comfort to read the helps in the HERALD."

Many acknowledgments come of help in times of business trouble and temporal need. An Old Subscriber writes from Kansas: "I have experienced God's goodness all my life long, and a long life he has given me. Now I have been relieved from great financial trouble. When, in his providence, I have had great trials, they brought me the closer to him and he gave me grace to trust his wisdom and goodness." Mrs. M. writes from East Washington, N. H.: "I wish to acknowledge, through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, answers to prayer in the restoring to health of a loved one and the success of business plans." A Constant Reader, of Cairo, N. Y., writes: "After praying long and earnestly to him in a time of great financial straits, the answer came." T. D. B., writes from Bushyhead, Okla.: "My temporal affairs have been very discouraging and depressing since last winter. I have carried my trouble to the Lord in special, earnest prayer, daily since that time. Thank God! He has heard my petition and granted relief."

The following letter is so good that we print it entire. It is signed: "A Firm Believer in Prayer," and manifests the kind of faith that will trust God not only when delivered from trouble, but when called upon to bear it. The contribution enclosed has been applied to the purpose designated.

A friend loans me your paper, and I have often thought when reading the Answered Prayer Column that I would like to contribute a bit toward it. The command is "acknowledge the Lord in all thy ways," and it is sweet to obey. I have been a church member since childhood, and now in middle life I can testify that wonderful answers to prayer have come to me for many years. I have seen much illness, have suffered loss of all my nearest friends and relatives, been obliged to give up a business position and am now a confirmed invalid, but through it all God has been so preciously near, granting my petitions for relief so quickly, that my faith has never faltered. I go to him as simply as a child to its parents, telling him all my troubles, and feeling he hears and answers prayer. His promise should remove all doubt from our hearts. Let me say you are doing a fine work. I inclose a little offering for the relief of some suffering mother or child.

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

Mrs. S. G. H., Gardner, Mass.; A. L., Winston-Salem, N. C.; A Kansas Mother, Mrs. E. D. M., Barnard, Kan.; Mr. and Mrs. J. O. B., Elk Prairie, Mo.; M. F. E., Sayre, Okla.; A Reader, Jamestown, N. Y.; E. L. M., Danville, Iowa; A Reader, Springfield, Ohio; A Kentuckian, Danville, Ky.; J. B. J., Buffalo, N. Y.; F. M. A., Readville, Mass.; A Reader, Sullivan, Ill.; Mrs. B., Medina, Ohio; M. H. W., Los Angeles, Calif.; J. B. G., DeLand, Ill.; A Nebraska Reader, Exeter, Neb.; Mrs. L. S., Roseberry, Idaho; Mrs. A. C. V., Williamsport, Pa.; M. A. Y., Chelsea, Mich.; Mrs. J. The Average Buyer Buys the Remington

IF he buys on reputation, he buys the Remington. If he buys on side-by-side comparison, he buys the Remington. If he buys on nothing short of actual test, he buys the Remington. In any case and under any conditions, the Remington is his natural choice.

The actual test is the most decisive of all. If you do not know by actual test the time saving merits of the Column Selector of the Model 10 Remington, then you do not know the Remington Typewriter of today. And the Column Selector is only one example. There are many new improvements on the present day Remington models; improvements which are the very latest contributions to typewriter progress. The side-by-side comparison or the actual test will convince you that these improvements are a necessity—to you and to every typewriter user.

We shall be glad to send you a copy of our latest illustrated booklet, "Some Points on the Visible Remingtons," for the asking.

AN INDIAN CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE

THE Southwest Indian Conference, an annual gathering of missionaries and Christian workers interested in the propagation of the Gospel among the Indians of the Southwest, held its seventh annual meeting, this year as last, in Flagstaff, Ariz. There were present missionaries from Navajo, Hopi, Mohave, Apache and California Mission Indians, as well as pastors, Sunday school and other Christian workers. The conference opened with a praise service in the Methodist church, conducted by the pastor, Rev. Robert E. Wright. A high note was sounded by Rev. James Lyons Meade of the Protestant Episcopal Church, as chairman of the local committee, who, in extending the hospitality of the city and churches of Flagstaff, expressed the desire that all might partake of the blessing and power of the Holy Spirit, the unfailing Guide.

The day sessions of the conference were held in the Presbyterian Church. The evening meetings, continued in the Methodist church.

Preceding the evening sessions a meeting was conducted on Front Street, in charge of Rev. James R. Smith of St. Louis, Mo. Mr. Smith is popularly called "Railroad Jim" because of his former occupation as railroad engineer. These street meetings showed the class of men and women known as "down and outs" that like Paul, who said: "I am willing to preach the Gospel to you who are at Rome also," the Christians of Flagstaff and the missionaries and Christian workers visiting were anxious to prove the sufficiency of Christ for all classes. They received a respectful hearing, and God honored his Word when several men expressed a desire to become Christians, afterwards attending the meetings in the church.

The Sunday meetings were held in the three churches of Flagstaff simultaneously in the morning, with a visiting pastor or missionary in the pulpit, the evening union meetings partaking of the evangelistic character.

Three days of the conference were distinctively devoted to Indian topics. The business of the conference occupied the opening and closing of each session of these three days. On Sunday night, August 24, the Seventh Annual Indian Conference was closed with a service in the Protestant Episcopal church, presided over by the new president, Rev. Howard A. Clark.

Extension of Facilities

We should like to tell you in detail about the various processes, forms, and mechanical devices that play so important a part in the publication of this journal—beginning with the receipt of the daily mail from all quarters of the globe and the selection therefrom of editorial matter; on through the many metamorphoses of editing, typesetting, proof-reading, engraving and electrotyping, printing, binding, folding, wrapping and addressing. We should like to explain the operation of the big presses at Twenty-fifth Street, now twelve in number, where each week are run off more than three hundred thousand complete copies like the one you hold—destined for circulation throughout the civilized world.

But this must be reserved for another time. We merely touch on these matters to afford you a perspective of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as a whole, and that you may form for yourself some idea of the operative, managerial, and administrative problems confronting those who would publish an illustrated weekly journal of this size and circulation. The actual work to be done is so important, and of such steadily increasing proportions, that the facilities for carrying it on need be constantly added to, and an army of skilled helpers must be maintained the year round.

Some idea of the magnitude of the present CHRISTIAN HERALD output may be formed from the fact that the yearly consumption of paper is about 2,210 tons—an average of 42½ tons a week. If all the pages of the 52 weekly issues—the product of a single year—were bound in average book form they would make a library of 3,230,400 volumes of 400 pages to the volume, more than the number of books in America's three largest libraries: Congressional, Washington, D. C., Boston Public, and the New York Public, the last named of which now embraces the Astor and Lenox Libraries and several smaller circulating libraries. And were these pages (CHRISTIAN HERALD size) cut out and pasted together lengthwise, margin to margin, they would form a continuous roll of printed paper of sufficient length to encircle the globe one and three-fourths times.

Good Returns

When you buy Guaranteed First Mortgage Participations, you secure the highest returns consistent with the security of your principal. Every dollar invested is secured two for one, by improved, well located St. Louis real estate, and backed by the combined capital, surplus and undivided profits of this Company and of the Mortgage Guarantee Company of St. Louis, which guarantees the payment of the principal and interest. These two companies are legally liable for the safety of every dollar invested and for the interest it earns, and their responsibility adds over $1,000,000.00 to the original security.

Guaranteed First Mortgage Participations are issued for any amount from $50.00 up, to run from two to sixty months. The rate of interest, 4%, 4½% and 5%, is governed by the length of time for which they are taken out, and is remitted or compounded, at the option of the investor.

DEPARTMENT OF INVESTMENT COUNSEL

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

Neither THE CHRISTIAN HERALD nor any other publication can guarantee the value of investment securities. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns. Any advice given is an expression of our conclusions, based upon information we believe to be reliable; but we must not be held responsible, should any loss arise from its acceptance.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

R. A., NEW YORK. The first and refunding mortgage five-year gold bonds of the Louisville Gas & Electric Co. represent, according to our belief, a most attractive public utility corporation investment, and we believe that you will be safe in accepting the firm's offer.

C. C. T., MICHIGAN. Much as we admire the persistency of Mr. M. W. Savage, president of the M., St. P. & R. El. Tr. Co., otherwise known as the Dan Patch road, the shares of the road are not recommended as an investment, even if common stock may be secured free with a purchase of the preferred stock.

H. I., KENTUCKY. You ask if we consider the stock of the Boulder Tungsten Production Co. of Colorado at 50 cents a share a good investment. We do not consider this stock a good investment and advise you to leave it alone. But little tungsten is mined in Colorado, and no mine in the State yields tungsten exclusively.

REV. G. W. S., NEW MEXICO. We are advised by Mr. Benjamin D. Haight, deputy superintendent of the Banking Department of the State of New York, that a dividend of 15 per cent. will probably be paid to claim-holders of the Industrial Savings & Loan Company on or about November 1, 1913. This is cheering news to the patient creditors.

S. P. D., IOWA. Missouri Pacific stock at around thirty is not "cheap." It is selling for all it is worth as a speculation. As an investment the stock should not be considered at all. These observations are made in full realization of the vast improvement that President B. F. Bush has brought about in the road's condition since he assumed the management and in the belief which we acknowledge, that ultimately the company will earn sufficient profits to permit payments of dividends on the stock.

G. R. L., NEW JERSEY. We have no knowledge of the Kenai Mining & Milling Company of Seward, Alaska. It is impossible for us to keep in touch with mining stocks which are not dealt in on mining exchanges. You will realize the futility of our attempting to do so when we state that more than 400,000 mining companies have been incorporated in the United States and Alaska within the last ten years, and only 88 are now regularly reporting dividends. This does not speak well for mining as a business. Most of the others cannot be traced, are presumably dead and the money invested therein utterly lost.

M. J. J., NEW YORK. Ask yourself why the Wheatley Heights estates should give you a building lot on Long Island free and clear of all encumbrances. Ask yourself if the explanation for this gift, as expressed in their letter to you, is a sufficient one. The scheme is an old one. It is worked by other companies, perhaps not just this way, but along similar lines. Some of these other companies give away lots and then expect the recipients to buy adjoining lots. The Wheatley Heights estates scheme may entail a similar obligation. Our advice to all CHRISTIAN HERALD readers is: Keep out of long-distance real estate speculation.

B. N. R., NEW HAMPSHIRE. We believe the following securities meet your requirement for an investment of $5,000, which you state is the amount of a bequest from a deceased relative:

	Per Cent.
$1,000 Public Service Corporation of New Jersey, 6 per cent. Perpetual Interest Bearing Certificate to yield	5.75
$1,000 Southern California Gas Company first mortgage 6 per cent. gold bond to yield	6.00
$1,000 Pacific Light & Power Corporation Collateral Trust, 6 per cent. five-year gold bond to yield	6.00
$1,000 Baltimore & Ohio Railroad first mortgage gold 4 per cent. bond to yield	4.63
$1,000 Louisville & Nashville unified gold 4 per cent. bond to yield	4.60

A. B. Y., FLORIDA. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has never printed advertisements of the Guarantee Title & Banking Company of Atlanta, Ga., now in the hands of receivers, although the business was offered to us repeatedly. Hence, you cannot charge THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with being even indirectly responsible for your loss. Had you asked this department's opinion of the investment, you probably would not have made the venture at all. Many magazines did carry the advertising of this firm. We cannot tell you when you will be in receipt of any portion of your money or if you will ever get any of it at all. We hope the time will come when people will absolutely avoid the pitfalls made by financial schemers and their visionary short-cuts to impossible interest rates.

N. T. L., NEW YORK. You state that you have $1,200 to invest at 6 per cent. with safety and prefer to invest in convertible bonds or Great Northern preferred stock. We do not know of any convertible railway bond issue that will net 6 per cent. which can be recommended to you. We think your money will be reasonably safe invested in Great Northern preferred. At present price this stock will return 5½ per cent. and your capital will just about secure ten shares. Great Northern preferred is a favorite investment with those who can afford to assume a speculative risk. No stock is as safe as a first mortgage bond or even a convertible bond of a railway. The St. Paul convertible 4½s in $100, $500 and $1,000 denominations, now quoted at 103½, are a more attractive investment, in point of security, than any railroad share in the market, and through their conversion feature, afford a considerable speculative attraction. From fourteen different convertible issues yielding from 4¼ per cent. to 5½ per cent., we have selected St. Paul convertible 4½s, believing they stand highest.

W. F., NEW JERSEY. We do not recommend the eight per cent. preferred stock, and should leave it severely alone. The security market is too well supplied with sound investments to permit one to gamble on uncertainties. It is possible, at this time, to make a selection of attractive securities at prices which will permit of—not an eight per cent. yield—but of yields of from five to seven per cent., but the prices which permit of these yields will not exist very much longer. Below we offer a list of bonds for your consideration, which we believe to be exceptionally attractive. If you desire, we will tell you the name of the banking firm from whom these bonds may be secured.

Middle Western Public Utilities Fold 6s (1916) 97.65 to yield 7 per cent.

Carolina Power & Light First 5s (1928), 88 to yield about 6 per cent.

Georgia Light, Power & Railways 5s (1941) 100 to yield 6 per cent.

Southern Counties Gas of California 6s (1941) 100 to yield 6 per cent.

Springfield (Mo.) Ry. & Light First Lien 5s (1926) 92 to yield about 6 per cent.

W. A. H., PENNSYLVANIA. You are quite right in believing that reliable investment firms will not "wilfully mislead." You state that in talking over investment matters with conservative bankers, there is an apparent frigidity in the atmosphere on any investment possibility outside of what they call well-sensoned bonds. Right again! Banking firms are very careful to exclude from their lists of offerings any investment security regarding which there is the slightest question. Of course, even banking firms of the best kind sometimes err and pick out issues which prove to be unprofitable and sometimes even failures, but these cases are rare, and if an investor will stick to the high-class banking firms he is pretty sure not to go astray when making his investments. The securities below which you have selected for final consideration: East Pennsylvania Gas & Electric Co., Metropolitan Electric Co., Fort Dearborn Hotel Building, South Carolina Light, Power & Railways, are all, we believe, attractive issues in point of safety, marketability and income return. We do not, however, look with very much favor on Bethlehem Steel first lien and refunding 5s compared with the bonds of an approved public utility corporation, and the reservation made by the representative from the banking firm regarding these bonds was very well taken. You also ask for a list of five or six well-sensoned railway bonds. Calling your attention to the fact that such securities offer considerably smaller income yields, we name the following:

	Yield Per cent.
N. Y. Central L. S. Coll. 3½s, 1998	4.45
Great Northern-North Pacific 4s, 1921	4.83
Penn. General Freight Equip. 4½s, 1919-'23	5.00
Baltimore & Ohio, conv. 4½s, 1933	5.10
Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio 1st 5s, 1938	5.10
Hocking Valley eq. tr. 5s, 1920	5.25
Baltimore & Ohio secured 5s, 1914	5.35

$1,000 Should Earn $60 a Year

One's invested funds should not only be kept at work constantly, but should be kept working to their maximum capacity, consistent with safety.

Experience has shown that the limit of safe return in investments is about 6 per cent. Money which is earning less than this interest rate is not working as efficiently as it should.

To investors desirous of obtaining an attractive interest rate, with assured safety, we will be pleased to explain the merits of the First Mortgage Serial Bonds we sell, the safeguards with which we surround them, and the comprehensive service we give our clients.

The greatest amount of dredging, or wet excavation, has been in the two channels at each end from deep waters to shores, altogether eight and one-half miles. These channels have a mean width of four hundred feet, and a minimum depth of forty-one feet; and in connection with this, there has been a great amount of labor in building dikes, or breakwaters, to resist the tides.

The chief engineer's report of July 1, 1913, gave as the grand total of dry and wet excavations, 203,383,539 cubic yards, with 14,812,034 then remaining to be excavated. The total excavations by the two French companies was 78,146,960 cubic yards, of which 29,908,000 have been utilized in our adopted plan of canal.

The locks are immense structures. The aggregate amount of concrete work up to the report of July 12, 1913, in the six double locks was 4,468,112 cubic yards, requiring about the same number of barrels of cement. The lock gates consist of two leaves, which are massive steel structures, each leaf being seven feet thick and sixty-five feet long. For the different locks they vary in height from forty-seven to eighty-two feet, and in weight from four hundred to seven hundred and fifty tons. Each lock, with the exception of the lower lock at Miraflores, has intermediate gates, making ninety-two leaves in the entire canal. The device for opening and closing these gates was invented by Eduard Schildhauer, an engineer employee. The gates, valves and fender chains of the locks are operated by electricity by one man at a switchboard, and the time required to open or close a gate is calculated to be two minutes. Electric motors will tow the vessels through the locks.

The total cost of the canal, including payments to the French Canal Company and to the Republic of Panama, the re-locating the Panama Railroad, sanitation, civil administration and a score of other items, is $375.000,000.

While the official date of opening the canal has been set for January 1, 1915, it is the intention to allow vessels to utilize it as soon as practicable. Present indications seem to bear out the opinion expressed by Colonel Goethals that this can be accomplished near the close of the present year. It is the intention of Secretary Daniels that the entire battleship fleet of the United States shall make the initiatory passage when the chief engineer gives notice that the waterway is ready.

Twice within a week has the Canal Zone been rocked with earthquake. The first shock was on Wednesday, October 1, when the disturbance lasted about twenty seconds. The second time was on Saturday, October 4, about 5.06 P.M., when the shock, almost equal in intensity to that on Wednesday, but of slightly shorter duration, was felt through the Isthmus, shaking buildings, opening fissures, and causing general apprehension. In neither case, however, was the canal or any of the locks affected in the slightest degree. The huge masses of concrete easily withstood the strain.

Prof. A. H. Sayce, D.Litt., LL.D., D.D., Fellow of Queens College, Oxford, says: "You have brought the art of lexicography as near to perfection as possible. I have always regarded your old Standard as a remarkable monument of learning and usefulness, but your new dictionary is evidently leaving it far behind."

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

Our Heavenly Helper*

DO WE really believe that Christ is with us? The statement is made on the editorial page of this anniversary number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that there were some remarkable coincidences in preparing the material for publication. The first instalment of Pastor Sheldon's wonderful story, "Jesus Is Here!" had already been set up. Just in time to appear in the same issue came a sermon from Bishop Wilson in which he declares again and again that Jesus is present in life to-day. And when the week's subject for the Christian Endeavor and Baptist Union was looked up, it was found to be "The Ideal Christian—Our Heavenly Helper." In the passage assigned for study are words which fit with thrilling appropriateness into the general message of this anniversary number: "He hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee, so that we may boldly say, the Lord is my helper." Best of all is the assurance: "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day and forever."

What does it mean to you that Jesus is in the world to-day? How different is your life from what it would be if he were absent from the world? Notice the exceedingly personal form of the statement: "The Lord is my helper." That means you. You, with your peculiar needs, your peculiar weaknesses, your peculiar circumstances. He knows all about you, and he knows all about them. He knows your name, and where you live, and which room in your home you occupy. He knows what your daily tasks are and whether you are doing them well or poorly. He knows who your friends are and whether or not you are helping them to be good. He knows whether or not you are kind and gentle, patient and true and honorable and pure. He knows whether you are doing all you can to win others to him and help him in his great task of saving the world.

The key to this week's lesson is in those last words. If we have made it the business of our life to help him he makes it his business to help us. He puts all his infinite power at our disposal. All his fidelity, all his unchangeableness, all his strength, all his love are on our side and come gladly for our help every day. He has put himself under obligations to help us. His promises are so sure that nothing in all the universe can be compared to their stability. And with all the intensity of his love and the changelessness of his purpose he has promised to save and bless, to guide and strengthen and keep us.

It is a dreadful thing to be working at cross purposes with God. It is a dreadful thing to have to fear that the things we are trying to do are not the things he wants done. It is sad to be compelled to wonder whether or not our tasks are so in harmony with his will that we can ask his power to help us do them. There were many years in Paul's life when he was working vehemently at tasks which he honestly thought God wanted him to do. But there came the blinding flash of God's light upon his eyes, upon his brain and upon his soul, and he saw that he had been working against God instead of for him, that he had been pitting his power against the power of God. And out of the blinding light that shone about him there came the sad voice of the Christ whom he had hated and whose followers he had pursued: "I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest. It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks."

After Paul had met Jesus he had no doubt that God was with him. Indeed, he felt that he had no power of his

You Can Be So Well

That Your Whole Being Vibrates Health

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 63,117 women up to the present time. Just think! this means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles, and to my 12 years' personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils and I have done all this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty. If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work.

I want to help every woman to be perfectly, gloriously well, with that sweet, personal loveliness which health and a wholesome, graceful body give—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, full of the health and vivacity which make you a

A Better Wife A Rested Mother A More Valued Friend

I bring each pupil to symmetrical proportions and I teach her to stand and to walk in an attitude which bespeaks culture and refinement. A good figure, gracefully carried, means more than a pretty face. I want to give you

A Good Figure

Too Fleshy? I have reduced 32,000 women. One pupil writes me: "Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now.

"When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all SO EASY. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin? "I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman.

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion, for I sleep like a baby and my NERVES are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

The vital strength gained by a forceful circulation relieves you of such chronic ailments as

Constipation	Torpid Liver	Indigestion
Rheumatism	Weakness	Dullness
Irritability	Nervousness	Sleeplessness
Sufferings in Pregnancy	Catarrh, etc.

Many women suffer uncomplainingly from ailments which may lead to graver troubles and lead to much unhappiness.

You Can Be Well Without Drugs

I strengthen the muscles and nerves of the vital organs, lungs and heart and start your blood to circulating as it did when you were a child. I teach you to breathe so that the blood is fully purified.

I wish I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to make you realize that you do not need to be ill, but that you can be a buoyant, vivacious, attractive woman in return for just a few minutes' care each day in the privacy of your own home.

I give each pupil the confidential treatment which her particular case demands.

Write me today telling me your faults in health and figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you. I am at my desk from 8 a. m. until 5 p. m.

I have published a free booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly and giving other information of vital interest to women. If you are perfectly well and your figure is just what you wish, you may be able to help a friend—at least you will help me by your interest in this great movement for perfect health, for greater culture, refinement and beauty in women.

Sit down and write me NOW. Don't wait—you may forget it.

I have had a wonderful experience and I should like to tell you about it.

A Perfected Picture Machine for Home Entertainment

The foremost lens makers of America have solved the problem of satisfactorily projecting enlarged pictures from the pictures themselves, as well as through lantern slides.

Bausch and Lomb HOME BALOPTICON

Shows colored pictures, photo prints, type matter or solid objects, such as coins, minerals, etc., with a clearness and brilliancy heretofore impossible except with lantern slides.

Shows Type Without Reversing. With no other popular priced instrument can you project written or printed matter without the extra expense of a reversing mirror. You will realize how this increases the opportunities for pleasure and entertainment.

Shows Solid Objects. Owing to the fact that the object holder is on the floor of the light chamber rather than on the wall as in other home instruments, it is possible to show solid objects. The works of your watch, pieces of jewelry, botanical specimens are all subjects possible to project readily in the Home Balopticon only.

Scientific Illumination. The fact that the Home Balopticon is equipped with one of the famous B & L achromatic lenses and that years of laboratory experiment are behind its wonderful system of illumination and reflection, accounts in a large measure for the superior clearness and brilliancy of its pictures.

Another advantage is that each outfit includes two adjustable picture holders and an aluminum coated wall screen which makes the image many times more brilliant than can the ordinary sheet.

That this is the best of all home picture machines will be apparent if you compare demonstrations with any other similar projector at any price. At photographic dealers — not toy stores.

For lantern slide users the Home Balopticon can be supplied in a model combining lantern slides with opaque pictures giving instant interchange between the two.

Note the possibilities of the flat object holder.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

own at all any more, but that all the power of his life came from God. "Whereunto I labor," he cried, "striving according to his working which worketh in me mightily." He was glad even to bear suffering and trials which would emphasize his own weakness in order that, as he said: "The power of Christ may rest upon me."

Are you really taking this vast, this limitless power of God to help you in your daily life? You say: "My life is too small. It would not pay God to turn very much of his power into it." Listen! "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty, and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to naught the things that are."

No task in God's kingdom is insignificant. Whatever the thing may be that you have to do, if you do it for God it instantly becomes a great thing. Because you are doing it for him, and because it is a thing which he wants done and done well he will give you the power to do it.

He is not only in heaven helping us from that mysteriously long distance. He is even closer than if he were in physical presence at our side. He promises to dwell within us by the power of the Holy Spirit. This was the innermost heart of Paul's great message: "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."

Scientific Efficiency*

EFFICIENCY is a modern word. At least it has come within a very few years to have a new and somewhat technical meaning. It means the principle of directing labor so that the greatest possible gains are produced. It was found in some cases that if the movements of laborers were timed and directed by experts they would accomplish more with a smaller expenditure of strength.

The point for the Epworth League to consider is that there are possibilities in the mental, spiritual and physical life of each one of us, in the regular opportunities of life, and in the allotment of our time, which would lead to far greater usefulness if rightly realized. It is necessary to take some time for recreation, for amusement, for purely social interests. But it is quite likely that every one who reads these lines could, by a careful study of himself and his opportunities, accomplish vastly more than at present. We can train ourselves in Bible study; we can train ourselves in habits of prayer; we can train ourselves in watching for opportunities for service and for soul-winning. We can, as we work, gain skill in dealing with others and in finding and using successful ways of serving and helping and saving them.

The passages assigned for our Scripture study emphasize the need of dependence upon God, who will provide us the grace and the power needed for our work, and they urge us to diligence, to enthusiasm, to perseverance and to vigor. "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord and not unto men." (Col. 3: 23.) In II Tim. 2: 15, the picture is presented of "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed." We shall be ashamed if we find at the last day that we have not, with the splendid resources of divine power at hand, made the most of ourselves and of our opportunities.

* "ARE WE TRAINING OURSELVES TO SERVE WITH SCIENTIFIC EFFICENCY?" Epworth League Topic for Sunday, November 2, 1913. II Tim. 2: 15; Eccles. 9: 10; Rom. 12: 11; Col. 3: 23; II Cor. 3: 4-6; I Cor. 15: 10.

Questions and Answers

Distressed, Chippewa Falls, Wis. I am not yet a Christian. I have so little faith; I know I ought not to doubt as I do, but I have very often prayed and asked God to help me overcome evil habits, but do not receive the strength and peace I need.

As we have stated many times in OUR MAIL-BAG, there is only one way out of spiritual difficulties, and that is to trust Jesus. Many letters come, telling of all sorts of trouble, and it is very evident from the way they are worded that the writers think their trouble lies in this or that, but always there is something in the letter that gives away the real trouble, which is that they are not trusting Christ. We have selected from your long letter, which we have read very carefully, the few lines we quote, because the root of all your trouble is expressed in them. You must trust Christ. You must expect him to help you. You must believe that he forgives your sins, every one of them—right up to the present minute. You must believe that he will cleanse your heart by the power of his blood and by the fire of the Holy Spirit and that he will give you power, moment by moment, to resist temptation. Remember that Christ came and lived for the express purpose of saving, helping and loving sinners. Think of his activities among them. Read of his never-failing kindness, his ever ready forgiveness, his sympathy with the tempted. He himself was tempted in order to better understand our troubles in that respect. See what happened to Peter. See to what depths David fell. And still when they found themselves and rose again from the death of their failings none were more acceptable to God. What did Jesus say of the publican (Luke 18: 10 ff.); what to the thief on the cross? Did any one ever come to him in vain? And just your desire for better things and your being distressed show that you are decidedly nearer to God than are many who are in the class of the Pharisee. Your nervous system is evidently badly impaired by your worries and sufferings and you should consult a good physician, preferably a Christian, in whom you should confide fully. You are evidently unduly sensitive. People are not so apt to blame and condemn as you think, and you know that God loves you, and understands your longings and struggles. He will surely help you if you will only trust him.

B. S., Pleasant Hill, Ill. Will you please explain to me how the location for a good well can be found by "water witching" with a forked stick? If this is a true way of finding water why cannot the average man do it?

The use of the "divining rod" for locating water has been quite generally discredited, though some recent experiments in Germany and France have led some experts to think that it may after all have some value. If it has any such value it is in a psychical way rather than on the ordinary basis of physical science. The explanation offered is that some people are peculiarly sensitive to the presence of water and show it by a slight, unconscious muscular action, which is noticeable when the rod is in their hands. Some of the details of your description are clearly impossible and there would be every reason to believe those claiming to locate water in this way were impostors. An electrical device for locating water has been invented, on the principle that the running streams could be heard by the use of an electric battery and megaphone, but this is not believed to be of great practical value.

Mary Reed, the well known missionary to the lepers of India, writes from Chandag Heights, via Almora: "To-day's mail brought to me the draft for $150 kindly forwarded by your treasurer for Mrs. J. A., Pennsylvania, to whom I have to-day written, thanking her for the much help her gift gives in various departments of the Lord's work away here in this one of the ends of the earth. Believe me very grateful for all the help that comes through the great channel of your valued and valuable columns."

Reader, Mamaroneck, N. Y. The Balkan women who are reported as having joined the army are reviving the spirit of those women warriors who, according to the Greek legends, overran Asia Minor, Thrace, Greece itself and even extended their conquests to Egypt. Like the Hittites, the early Amazons are said to have worshiped a nature-goddess. In modern days, the Amazonian spirit has sometimes been rekindled in times of great emergency. The women of Armenia assisted in fighting the Moslems. In West Africa, the Amazonian guards of the last king of Dahomey are said to have been sanguinary fighters, but they have long since disappeared. The revival of the warlike spirit among the women of Albania, due doubtless to the peculiar conditions now prevailing there, will probably be shortlived and will pass away and be forgotten when peace comes. It is a temporary phase of that "harking back" to semi-savagism that is not confined to the Balkans, but finds a nearer illustration in the methods of the militant suffragists.

J. D., Chattanooga, Tenn. The notion that the unattractive and monotonous character of the services in some churches is due to the "color scheme" back of the pulpit is a novel one, though we hardly think it would be accepted as an explanation of dull sermons. Why not change the "color scheme" in your own church and note whether the substitution of pleasing tints for dull grays and browns does not inspire cheerfulness in the audience?

Mrs. E. P. M., Lambert, Ga. Ex. 24: 9, 10, 11 must be read in connection with the explanatory passage in Deut. 4: 15. When Moses, Aaron, Nadab and Abihu went up to Mount Horeb with seventy of the elders of Israel, that which they saw was probably not the visible form or representation of the Deity, for the passage in Deuteronomy clearly declares this. Commentators believe that what they saw was a symbol or emblem of the divine glory, distinctly displayed before them as chosen witnesses.

G. C., Lisbon Falls, Me., writes: "The law of England forbidding the marriage of a deceased wife's sister was repealed two or three years ago. But once in a while a clergyman of the established church refuses to recognize its repeal, and refuses to administer the communion to persons so married. A case of that kind has for a long time been before the ecclesiastical and civil courts in my own city (Norwich, England). Both courts have decided against the clergyman."

E. C. S., Magnolia, N. C. The passage in Matt. 3: 15, according to Scrivener, a recognized authority, may be rendered "to fulfil every ordinance"; or, as Campbell interprets it, "every institution." Still another commentator writes: "Our Lord seems to have said in substance: 'Thus do I pledge myself to the whole righteousness of the law—thus symbolically do I enter on and engage to fulfil it all,'" or, as another commentator has aptly put it, "to show his conformity to all God's precepts and to every divine institution."

Mrs. J. B., Gagetown, Mich. We believe you have been wrongly informed concerning the woman suffrage States. All the indications are that the movement will spread to other States; but it will be by peaceful and orderly means and legitimate agitation, and not by such disturbances as are taking place abroad. The foreign militants are now obliged to confess that the suffrage prospects, for the time being at least, are destroyed in England.

Reader, Monsontown, Pa. The question you put as to the moral right of a person to profit by investments which involve Sunday labor on the part of others is one that could not be decided without a full knowledge of all the facts. Labor that is connected with works of "necessity and mercy" is not forbidden. Besides, we should not be hasty in judging others.

M. D. B., Washington, D. C. "In a recent editorial you ask 'Why are our churches so far from being filled?' I answer, because of the fashion nowadays of too much choir and too little congregational singing. In evidence thereof, in protracted meetings, revivals or evangelistic meetings, there is always much singing, sometimes a half-hour song service, and crowds are drawn to hear the preacher. As soon as the special services close, the churches drop back to the old rut with a long program by the paid quartet and one, two or at most three hymns in which all may join; and the majority quit coming. The quartet may make good music, but very few appreciate it, and it doesn't draw. I know of a few active in church and Sunday school, who do not come to the preaching service until the choir is through with its performance."

E. M. G., Denver, Col. There have been many interpretations of the passage in Rev. 13: 16, 17, but none satisfactory. Some have held that the "mark" was the ivy leaf brand (the symbol of Bacchus) with which Antiochus Epiphanes branded the Jews; others that it meant the mark with which the votaries of idols distinguished themselves, and still others that it foreshadowed the Papal power and its symbol of allegiance. Verse 18, however, leaves it an unsolved problem, to the solution of which only those divinely gifted with wisdom might attain.

Rev. W. J. B., Paris, Ont., Canada. In repeating the Lord's prayer, which is the proper form: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that or those who trespass against us"?

Neither of these expressions occurs in the Bible. The form in Matt. 6: 12 is "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." In Luke 11: 2 the words are: "And forgive us our sins, for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us." In the Episcopal Prayer Book the petition is: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us"; in the Methodist ritual the words "them that" are used.

R. A. F., Bentonville, Va. The Balkan War proper was supposed to have been ended with the agreement of the Turkish and Bulgarian delegates in London; but that agreement was upset by the quarreling of the allies afterward, and practically repudiated. The "concert" of European Powers seems to have been sadly at variance, otherwise they could have enforced the terms of settlement. The sequel—the war among the allies—was a disgraceful spectacle for Christian Europe.

PERILS OF LIFE IN THE ARCTIC

BY BERTHOLD LENZ

Makkovik, Labrador

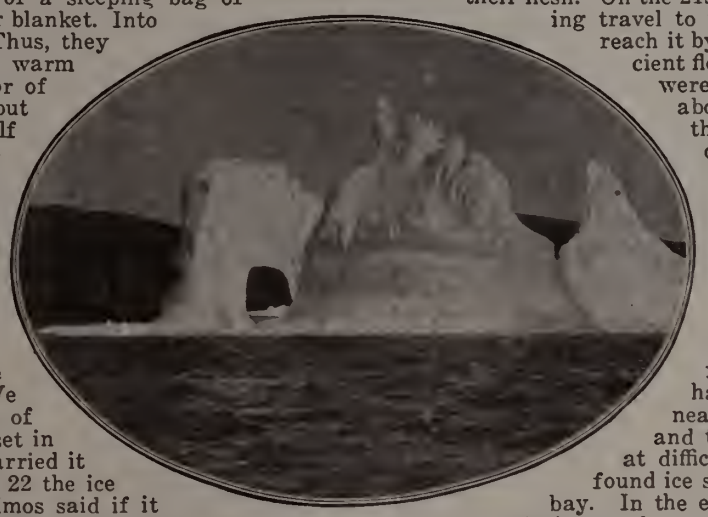
LABRADOR SNOWHOUSE AND KOMMATIK

KOMMATIK AND DOGS ON THE FROZEN BAY

THE MORAVIAN MISSION STATION AT MAKKOVIK

HE short season, which affords direct connection by a fortnightly mail-boat with Newfoundland, drawing rapidly to an end. month later and our coast ll be entirely deserted by all reign vessels, leaving us to rselves till the beginning of ly next year, when navigation n set in again. From Decem-r to June, a broad belt of ice uts us off from any connec-on by sea with the outside orld. Two or three times ithin this long period a mail edge, drawn by Eskimo dogs, rings a welcome break into the onotony of our winter life.

Our Eskimos are used to this nely life and think nothing of ; but at the same time they ke an interruption. Festival ays, for instance, are greatly njoyed, and, above all, Christ-ıas is the feast of joy to old nd young. None of them would ke to spend this time away rom the station, and even those ho are not residents of the mis-ion but have their houses along ne or the other of the many eep inlets twenty to forty niles distant, make an effort to come and keep Christmas with us, if weather nd ice allow this at all. And in order not to be prevented from coming by udden snowstorms, just shortly before the 25th they often come two to four lays before the time, lodging with some native friends at the station. Every-ody brings his "bed" with him in the shape of a sleeping bag of ealskin. Inside it is lined with hairy deerskin or blanket. Into his they slip, with most of their clothes on. Thus, they ıave an easily transportable and sufficiently warm ed. The bag is always placed flat on the floor of he house. In the morning it is rolled up and put nto a corner, serving perhaps as a seat. I myself ıave to adopt this mode of sleeping when trav-eling, sometimes for a whole fortnight without a break. It is certainly not so comfortable as a bed, and is rather hard underneath; but it is the only way to have a warm and yet light bed to carry about from house to house, and is of special comfort in a snowhouse. Last winter the ice was very unreliable before Christmas. All fresh-water ponds usually have a safe coat of ice about the middle or end of October. But the salt water of the sea only freezes when the surface temperature is about 18 degrees F. We had had ice in the bay at the beginning of December, but a short time of milder weather set in and heavy storms broke the ice up again and carried it away. At the unusually late date of December 22 the ice formed again, but it was very thin. The Eskimos said if it would freeze well another night, it might be good enough to allow outsiders to come. Salt-water ice is much tougher than fresh-water ice. We were much surprised, therefore, when on the same 22d of December, in the evening after dark, the shout, "Kemuksit!" gave us notice that a "kommatik" (Eskimo sledge) was arriving. "Kemuksit" is the shout of welcome with which residents greet a newcomer when he is still a good distance off. And really, a kommatik with seven persons arrived, who had come over the still quite thin and unsafe ice of the bay, about one-half mile in breadth. They were two families who had their winter houses at the station, but who, during the fall, had been camping farther north in order to have a better chance for seal-hunting. They had left the station by boat about the end of October, and had taken provisions with them to last till December, reckoning, of course, on an addition to their larder in the shape of seal meat and sea birds. But last fall proved to be exceptionally unfavorable for hunters on our coast. Owing to unusually frequent storms and blizzards, the Eskimos were unable to venture out on the sea in their small boats and kayaks. Seals also were scarce; when the sea is wild and blizzards frequent, they keep away from shore. Two seals were all that the men could shoot that season, and their meat was only too soon consumed. Besides, the two teams of dogs had to be fed. So they were thrown back entirely upon the scanty supply of provisions they had brought with them, consisting chiefly of flour and hard bread. These, also, gave out soon. With beginning of December they had to put aside such victuals for the use of children alone, whilst the adults tried to keep from starving by taking to the meat of foxes, crows, etc. The dogs grew lean till they were not much more than skin and bone. Two of them they killed at last to feed the rest with their flesh. On the 21st of December, the lack of good ice still preventing travel to the station, they resolved to make an effort to reach it by a long, roundabout way. There was only sufficient flour left to feed the children one day more. They were not very far from the station, which was only about ten miles off, a short distance by kommatik, if they could travel over the sea ice; but a broad, deep, open bay separated them from the land. They meant to try traveling inland along the bay first, hoping they might find ice there. This, however, was no easy task. The borders of the bay are partly formed by steep cliffs, high hills, with woody valleys between, the latter filled with deep, soft snow. Next morning was cold but bright, so they lashed their few things tightly upon the low kommatik, harnessed their dogs and made a start. Only the children could ride on the kommatik, as the poor dogs were hardly able to do much more than walk, being nearly starved. The women walked on foot in front, and the men helped to haul and push the kommatik at difficult places. Several miles farther inland, they found ice strong enough to bear, on which they crossed the bay. In the evening at seven o'clock they safely reached the station on the opposite side of the bay. It was a dark night, and they saw just enough to make out that there was ice, but there were little open places in the middle of the bay which they could not see. These they providentially escaped. It was by divine protection alone that the heavy kommatik arrived safe and sound. Several times the loaded hinder part broke through the ice, but the dogs pulled it up again and again. In a few days these good folk recovered from their fatigue, and at the following festival there was not a happier family present.



"A FREQUENT VISITOR ON OUR COAST"

CLERICS AND LAYMEN CONVEN

EPISCOPALIANS IN GENERAL CONVENTION AT NEW YORK CONSIDER VITAL PROBLEMS

THERE has been widespread interest in the sessions of the Episcopal General Convention, which began its work in New York on October 9. The metropolis has been stirred by the sight of great church functionaries and clergy, the laymen and the women meeting in various assemblages or taking part in the routine church life of a great city. Three bishops preached in the open air on Wall Street; the Church Socialist League gathered in St. Mark's Church near the Bowery; the Woman's Auxiliary held a great mass meeting in Carnegie Hall. On another evening a most impressive service was held in Carnegie Hall, attended by nearly all of the bishops, with a vested choir of three hundred voices; local pulpits, in some cases of other denominations, were filled by the visiting clergymen; editors and other laymen urged their views upon the sessions of the House of Deputies, and took time to mingle in the life of the city, renewing old acquaintances and making new, lending a hand in gatherings and debates here and there.

The matter about which it was expected that the greatest conflict of opinions would arise came prominently to the front on October 16. That was the subject of the change of name. Dr. W. T. Manning, rector of Trinity Church, New York, introduced a resolution requiring a two-thirds vote to make any change in the prayer-book. It was understood that the resolution for changing the name would come up in the form of a resolution to alter the title page of the prayer-book. Some of the addresses brought forward by the discussion of Dr. Manning's resolution, a debate in which some of the most influential members of the House of Deputies took part, revealed the conviction of the various leaders upon the subject of the change of name.

THE HOUSE OF DEPUTIES OF THE EPISCOPAL CONVENTION IN SESSION

Dr. Manning said, in defending the resolution which he presented:

> My objection to our present name is that it is too sectarian. It seems, in my humble judgment, not sufficiently to express the splendid catholic comprehensiveness of this church, its tolerance—yea, its much more than tolerance—its deliberate, glad inclusion of views and apprehensions of the common truth which are widely dissimilar.
> To me our present title does not seem to be big enough for the mighty tasks and opportunities to which we are now called. I wish we were ready to go as far as the Federation of Churches went in Chicago and to omit the word "Protestant" from our title, as they omitted it from theirs, on the ground that it is a word suggestive of theological controversy, and which although it expresses a certain aspect of our position, is not now suited to be emblazoned upon the very forefront of our banner.

On the other hand, Dr. Randolph H. McKim, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, declared:

> We do not believe that the present name of the church is a sectarian name. We know its history. We know that it was first applied in England in 1661 and in the colonies in 1666. We use the word "Protestant" not in that sense in which it was used there and here in the United States in the nineteenth century, but in the historical sense—the sense in which it has been employed by a long line of most illustrious divines of the Church of England.
> In clinging to the present name we do not say, either, that we are less catholic than our brethren who wish it changed. We believe, dear brethren, in the Catholic Church just as much as you, but we are not willing to stultify ourselves by calling a part the whole. We are only a part of the Catholic Church. To arrogate the name to ourselves might serve to undo all the splendid work already done toward Christian unity.

The House of Bishops continued to enforce its rule of secret sessions. From the time of Bishop Potter there has been a group of bishops who wished to admit the public to their deliberations, but the conservative members of the body outvoted the others in the matter and the meetings were held behind closed doors. The house accepted the resignation of Bishop Wells, missionary bishop of Spokane, and Bishop Gray, missionary bishop of Southern Florida, who retire on account of age and infirmity. The resignation of Bishop Knight, missionary bishop of Cuba, who retires to become vice-chancellor of the University of the South, at Sewanee, Tenn., was also accepted. The death of Bishop Kendrick, of New Mexico, in 1911, and the retirement of Bishop Van Buren, of Porto Rico, a year ago, make it necessary, with the retirements just announced, to elect five new bishops during the present Convention. The House of Bishops voted down a resolution which had passed the House of Deputies by a large majority, making the presiding bishop an elective office instead of falling, as it does now, to the senior bishop.

Much discussion arose in the House of Deputies over the proposition to combine the dioceses into provinces. Many feared that this system would eventually lead to the appointment of archbishops, but the supporters of the resolution declared that there was no such danger. The measure was finally passed by a large majority. There is a clause in the present constitution which provides that no diocese shall be included in a province without its own consent. The only dioceses opposing the measure were those of West Virginia and Southern Virginia. What attitude will be taken by these dioceses later is a matter of conjecture.

A resolution which aroused great interest throughout the country was one calling upon the Russian Church to clear itself of the charge of unfairness in its stand on the subject of "ritual murders," a charge which is frequently trumped up there against the Jews. The resolution, introduced by the Rev. J. Howard Melish, rector of Holy Trinity Church, Brooklyn, was as follows: "We call upon the archbishops, bishops and other leaders of the Holy Orthodox Eastern Church of Russia to make formal pronouncement that charges of so-called ritual murders are without foundation or justification in the teachings and practice of the religion of Israel, and remind them that in the early days of Christianity similar charges were made through ignorance and superstition against our own most holy religion."

Dr. Manning presented the report of the committee on plan and scope of the commission appointed three years ago to bring about a world conference of all Christian communions recognizing the divinity of Christ. Dr. Manning reported that thirty denominations or religious councils had already appointed similar commissions to act with that of the Episcopal Church in bringing about this world's conference.

It is the conviction of the commission that such a conference for the purpose of study and discussion, without power to legislate or to adopt resolutions, is the next step toward unity. Dr. Manning expressed great hope for the coming conference.

There is probably no doubt that the most s[tir]ling address of the whole Convention was that n[ot] by Bishop Spaulding of Utah, who spoke in [the] cathedral, at a meeting called to discuss the Ch[urch] and the Social Movement. The bishop said:

> We come to a General Convention of capitalists, for the lay deputies pay their own expenses few but capitalists men whose pay is high because their brains are paid fo[r] capitalists can afford to attend a General Convention.
> We worship in a great church like this and it makes u[s] get the slums just over the way. We watch bishops and p[ri]in holy vestments and we forget the millions who have rags to wear. We debate our canons and names and forge[t] toiling workers who are pleading for a living wage. We di[s]hymns and prayers and we forget that there are tens of [th]sands whose hearts are too heavy to sing and whose faith i[s] weak to pray.
> It is probably safe to say that each one of the lay dep[u]to this General Convention has at least ten times as muc[h] come as the workingma[n] the country. That means your average incomes $3,500 to $9,500 a year. would you like to live on one-tenth of just what spent to-day?
> Put it this way. All churchmen, of course, one-tenth of their incom[e] the Lord. Now how w[ould] you like to be compelled coming year to provide all your necessities and of your luxuries and your pleasures, all you s[pend] on yourself and all you s[pend] on your friends, all [your] clothes, all your books, your recreations, on what gave last year to the L[ord]
> If religion is supporte[d] is supported out of pr[ofits] not out of wages. It therefore, in the judgmen[t] the class conscious worke[r] gift of the rich made p[os]ble because of the plunde[r] of the workers. If the ch[urch] is endowed it is support[ed] past plunderings. There[fore] self-respect requires the c[lass] conscious workers to rep[u]ate organized Christianit[y] a charity which decent s[elf] respect forces them to [de]spise.
> The laboring man th[inks] that the capitalist pays [the] preacher and therefore ow[ns] him. And does not the ca[pi]talist think so too?
> What must the Church d[o]? Accept the truth which industrial democracy has d[is]covered—that labor and [the] capital is at the basis of p[ro]duction. Shall not the chu[rch] set her face against the co[m]petitive system of industry which inevitably involves the e[x]ploitation of men, women and little children? A. H. H.

Sulzer Impeachment Sustained

THE removal from office of William Sulze[r] the first governor of the State of New Yo[rk] to be impeached, was assured on October 1[7]. The action of the special tribunal in findin[g] him guilty on three of the first four Articles o[f] Impeachment made certain the final action. O[n] Article I, charging Mr. Sulzer with filing a fal[se] campaign fund statement, the court voted guilt[y] 39 to 18. On Article II, alleging that Mr. Sulze[r] committed perjury in swearing to that statemen[t] the verdict was guilty by a vote of 39 to 18. O[n] Article III, charging bribery of witnesses to witl[h]hold testimony from the Frawley Investigatin[g] Committee, the respondent was acquitted by a unanimous vote. On Article IV, alleging the su[p]pression of evidence by means of threats to wi[t]nesses summoned by the Frawley Committee, th[e] verdict of guilty was returned by a vote of 43 to 1[4].

The test vote taken on Thursday indicated tha[t] the court would stand 43 to 14 on the question o[f] Mr. Sulzer's removal from office. The court quali[fied] its verdict by deciding not to deprive him of th[e] opportunity to hold positions of "trust, honor an[d] profit" under the State in future. One of Mr Sulzer's advisers made the statement that, as th[e] court had convicted the governor of crimes com[mitted] before he assumed office, it had made the case reviewable by the Supreme Court, and that the case might be taken there by a writ of prohibition.

The impeached governor was unmercifully scored by those who spoke before the court on the last two days of the proceedings. Many of those who voted for him considered his innocence on one-half of the counts to be far outweighed by his conviction on the other half.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

group of friends are gathered in the library of Rev. Henry well, pastor of First Church, Raymond, on the anniversary he day when they had taken the pledge to make "What ld Jesus Do?" the test of their daily lives. In the group are ginia Page and Richard Stanton, Mr. Maxwell's new assist- They are all commenting upon a marvelous light which been appearing in the sky, when Martha, Mrs. Maxwell's d, enters the room with the exclamation: "Jesus is here!" declares that he came to the service of the Rectangle rch, a mission founded by First Church, and had gone home h Mr. Grey, the pastor. Mr. Maxwell calls up Mr. Grey by phone and is informed that the strange Guest is now asleep his home. Mr. Grey himself comes to the Maxwell home to te the details of the remarkable occurrence.

CHAPTER II—Continued

THE minute Grey entered the library in which Mr. Maxwell and his friends were assembled, his face revealed the tremendous experience through which he was passing.

Mr. Grey had begun his career as a professional angelist. He had been of the quiet, persuasive pe, not sensational at all in his methods, and ove all a man of deep and sincere spiritual ear- stness, who had one purpose: to bring men to God rough Christ. He had been ry successful as an evangelist work at the Rectangle, and hen the mission there, started his converts, had developed to a church, the people had amored for him as their pas- r. He had accordingly taken harge of the church, and with e help of Mr. Maxwell and the irst Church he was rapidly aping a strong and very use- l body of disciples, most of hom had been, like Martha, mong the social outcasts of the ty. One phrase may describe Ir. Grey in his personality. He as absolutely consecrated to eligious work. His one passion n life was to save souls. Mr. Iaxwell often said Grey was he most unselfish and Christ- ike man he ever knew.

The first words he spoke were he same as those uttered by Martha: "Jesus is here!"

Again that silence. Through he strange weeks that were to ollow, how often that same we-inspiring silence was des- ined to fall over the disciples of Jesus in many places and under many different circumstances! It seemed to be a part of the en- ire history of his appearance. The noisy earth had been full of clangor and uproar so many centuries. When had the people kept still to think of God? Their very definition of religion had been bustle, activity, energy, talking in meeting. Were these silences now to reveal that quiet approach to the divine which is so necessary before one can ap- proach the real needs of men?

Grey went on in a natural, deeply happy tone:

"He appeared in our meeting to-night. The moment he rose and spoke I knew it was He. My heart and my mind together welcomed him. Oh, it is the most wonderful thing! But it has actually come to pass! Jesus is here!"

"He is with you?" Maxwell asked in a whisper.

"He is in my house, asleep."

"Your guest?"

"My guest. In my home."

"What does he look like?" Three voices asked the question at the same time.

"Like any average man—and—different."

"There! I told you the same!" cried Martha.

"But that does not describe him," said Mr. Maxwell.

"Why not?" It was Stanton speaking. "What are we to look for? An angel? Would he not appear as an average man—yet different?"

Grey looked around on the eager, excited group. "What Mr. Stanton says is true. When you come to see him you will understand how impossible it will be for you to describe his appearance in literal terms. And yet no one of you will for a moment doubt that it is Jesus. Jesus is here! On the earth again! I have seen him! He has spoken in our church! He is a living presence in the flesh among men!"

"What will all this mean?" Mr. Maxwell again spoke almost inaudibly.

"It will mean everything for the church," Grey spoke with intense earnestness. "The church is under fire. It is being criticized. It is being scorned. Did you not all read that editorial in the Gazette only two nights ago, advising the closing of all the churches in Raymond on the ground that they were useless and an unnecessary expense?* And even our religious papers are full of articles deploring the weaknesses and shortcomings of churches and church members, speaking of the church as a weak and inefficient organization, whereas in reality it is the most powerful and useful institution in the world to-day."

"Just as Mr. Norman wrote in his reply in the News," said Virginia.

"But the ministers and church members never needed as right now to be assured of that fact. And the coming of Jesus will be the greatest impulse the church ever had to begin an entirely new and wonderful chapter of its history. Oh, if you could have heard Jesus speak to our people to-night! He declared the church to be the most useful and necessary of all institutions, and said his own disciples did not understand its mighty power and greatness."

TOGETHER THE TWO FRIENDS WATCHED IN SILENCE

"Grey, do you actually believe this person is Jesus? The same Jesus whom the world crucified twenty centuries ago?"

"I am as certain of it as I am certain I am here with you. No one can question his identity."

* Within the last six months a number of such editorials have appeared in daily papers in this country, actually advocating closing all the churches in the towns where these papers are published.

"But what is your proof? What is the real proof that people are going to accept?"

"Just himself. He is his own proof. No one can deny him. Some will not see anything but a common man at first, but I believe there will be times when all the people, his own disciples and others, will be compelled to bow down to him as King of kings."

"Do you think he will do any miracles to prove his personality?"

"No, not to prove it. But I believe he can do them if it is necessary for any purpose. The whole bearing of the man breathes power of an infinite quantity."

"Martha says he told her things about her life that no one but herself could possibly know."

Grey's face filled with intensest interest.

"Yes, he spoke to her after the meeting. It seemed to me he spoke to every one in the room personally. And on the way home to-night he said things to me that simply astounded me because they revealed such an intimate knowledge of my own history and feelings."

Again that silence. No one seemed to count the time. It passed by unnoticed, unthought of. Then Mr. Maxwell was saying:

"Do you suppose—he—this person — you are so sure is Jesus—would preach for us next Sunday? What are his plans? What will he do? What is his purpose? It is all too bewildering to entertain. We will not know how to approach him."

"Approach him!" Grey exclaimed, while his eyes flashed with an indescribable exultation; "he is the most approachable person I ever met. There is not a particle of pride or aloofness about him. He is the most companionable person I ever met."

"Why not? Is not that what we ought to expect in Jesus? Stanton's deep voice spoke. "Would he be Jesus if he were not the most companionable person Grey or any of us ever met?"

"The whole thing is beyond belief!" Maxwell cried out. "I have been longing for this very thing for years. Now that it has come—if it has—I feel unable to comprehend it."

"Don't try to comprehend it, Mr. Maxwell. Just enjoy it," said Martha, who sometimes revealed a depth of thought that made Mr. Maxwell wonder in what school she had learned it.

"Then we can see him at your house in the morning?" Maxwell turned to Grey as all the others had done.

"Yes. There is one thing he said definitely. He will visit churches and his disciples everywhere. How long he may stay in Raymond I don't know. But that is his purpose at first. He has come to comfort and encourage his own."

Every one was too much wrought up over the great event of the evening to feel sleepy, but Grey finally went home, and Stanton went along to his hotel. Rachel, Virginia, Dr. West and Felicia and Stephen soon went away. Alexander Powers and Norman stayed a little longer. Norman was specially excited, as a newspaper man, over all the future possibilities of events from the standpoint of an editor and journalist.

"Maxwell," he said, talking in his regular steady manner, but with a deep undercurrent of excitement, "if all this unparalleled thing is true, it opens up a most tremendous field for thought. I am specially concerned over what may occur in the newspaper world. It will be the greatest event of the centuries. And how will the sensation-loving and sensation-providing press treat it? It is unthinkable to subject our Master to the coarse and vulgar buffoonery and irreverence of the press that counts

MAN AND HIS INFLUENCE

*A SERMON BY REV. NEWELL D. HILLIS, D.D.

TEXT: "One man of you shall chase a thousand, for the Lord your God he it is that fighteth for you." Joshua 23: 10

HERE we have one man carried up to a thousand man-power, and two men become ten thousand, and all by omnipotent co-operation. Best of all, the statement is more than realized in modern scientific industry. To-day, even the average man is carried up to a hundred man-power through his machinery. After long study our inventors have learned how to harness the physical forces of God to man's tools and tasks. No workingman, now, thinks of depending upon himself alone for the production of wealth. No mason thinks of carrying his hod to the top of the twenty-story building; he asks the elevator to do it for him. No traveler thinks of using beacon fires to signal to his friends in Canada; he expects the electric current to flash his thought. Our Puritan fathers lived in log houses, wore rude garments, slaved from dawn till dark, but despite their incessant drudgery they lived poor, they died dwelling not far from want.

But to-day every member of the family has one hundred invisible slaves, toiling for him by day and night. That learned blacksmith, Burritt, struck a blow of one hundred pounds. The modern smith strikes a blow of ten tons, because he utilizes the forces of God. Julius Cæsar's voice reached ten thousand soldiers, but the modern voice will reach from New York to Denver. Modern wealth, the new comforts and conveniences, the wider travel, mean that one man has become a thousand, by entering into a partnership with the cosmic forces. Literally God has placed all his energies in land and sea and sky at man's disposal. God's winds fill our sails, his waters turn our mill-wheels, his air floats our new flying-ships. Man's weakness has been supplemented by God's omnipotence, and man's bondage to one spot widened to God's omnipresence.

God and the Race

This power, not ourselves, in the world, explains the great moral movements of the race. When physical manhood has been carried up to the *n*th power by the loan of God's omnipotence, then the moral manhood is multiplied through God's immeasurable spiritual energies. It is this increment of spiritual energy from without that explains the sudden multiplication of manhood in a herdsman like Moses. The man in yonder Edison power-house can lift his hand to a lever and control an invisible energy measured by a hundred thousand horse-power. But there is something strangely analogous to this in that scene when a shepherd from the desert stands before Pharaoh the king, and, with a herdsman's staff, backed up by an infinite God, begins to emancipate thirty thousand slaves. Apparently, it is the most audacious moment in human history. In reality, Moses was quite right, because when we think of Pharaoh we must think of an Egyptian king who has a million people behind him, but when we think of Moses we must think of Moses plus an omnipotent and omniscient God, with the forces of many million men behind him. God commanded Moses to speak, saying to Pharaoh, "Let my people go." But God also stood behind Pharaoh, preparing the king to listen in the same way that he had prepared the shepherd to speak. The Eternal Deep was behind Moses, sweeping him forward toward his duty. The Eternal Truth was behind Pharaoh, sweeping the king forward toward obedience to the great inner conviction spoken. God made Moses speak the truth of liberty and made Pharaoh afraid to disobey the law of liberty. The explanation of this shepherd who suddenly rises up into the dignity and majesty of a world emancipator, is the entrance of God into the scene.

In terms of anthropology there was no difference between the average Egyptian and the average Hebrew slave in Egypt. And yet suddenly, within forty years, here is a compacted nation, with sanitary laws, domestic laws, industrial and social laws, ethical principles and methods of spiritual worship. The explanation is that God placed all his spiritual energies at Moses' disposal, until the one shepherd became a thousand moral teachers, while two shepherds became ten thousand men in nation-building. Not otherwise it is John the Baptist and God that explains the moral upheaval in King Herod's time; it is Savonarola and God that explains the burning of the pyramid of vanities in the square of Florence; it is Martin Luther and God that explains the moral renaissance of Germany. In April the floods of sap, like a tidal wave, sweep over the forests. The new movement represents the power of an infinite sun lifting, and of a vast earth pushing. There is a power in the tree, not itself, that must be measured, in explaining what is sap to-day but that to-morrow will be leaf and fruit. It is thus that no man can tell in advance when God will raise up a man who will speak an eternal truth in rebuke of public oppression and sin, and borrow, as did Moses and Paul, temporarily God's immeasurable spiritual energy that will make one man in the wilderness to be more influential than the ninety millions.

The Power of Righteousness

This power, not ourselves, that makes for righteousness explains the strange crises of the soul, and the rise and growth of the religious life. Just as life is an importation from without the dead crystal, so religion is an importation from beyond the soul. Man is the candle of the Lord, but no candle is self-lighting. All candles were made to shine, but the radiance may be latent for years. Some candle factories are stored with boxes of wax tapers from cellar to roof, and still the factory may be dark as midnight. There are churches that have hundreds of people in them, but they are candles of the Lord that have never been lighted, or torches that burned but have been snuffed out. Man has a religious nature that is strung like a musical instrument to the touch of God. Man has an intellect, but culture is an importation from the world of truth without, through teachers and books. Man has an artistic faculty, but the beautiful is an importation carried in through the arts and the loveliness of nature and God. Man has a religious faculty, but it waits for the coming of God. This is what is meant by inspiration—the inbreathing of God. Abraham was in the desert, built in advance for religion. But the hour came when God came in upon the tides of the morning and flooded his soul with splendor, just as the morning sun breaks upon the hills, and floods the eyes with radiance, because the eyes were built in advance for the light that must come. That young, cunning, deceitful Jacob, who despoiled his brother, was made for God, but he did not know it. What changed this selfish boy into a prince of God in solid worth and character? It was the flame from a divine altar that lighted the little candle of Jacob's spirit. Wonderful the transformation of Saul to Paul, and the epicurean Augustine into the author of the City of God! But these miracles are happening every day. Why, in thirty years death will wipe out five hundred millions of Christian disciples. Does that mean that the whole world will then be barbarous and heathen, mere herds of fetish-worshipers? Not at all. God will work five hundred million new miracles, plus many more, to take the places of those who die. That is why the teacher, the reformer and the missionary are all but omnipotent. The inventors use God's physical energies, and the moralists use his spiritual influence, and, therefore, the new creations of spiritual life.

Apostolic Achievement

It is this principle that explains the occasional disciple who is carried up to apostleship. There is an immeasurable difference between a disciple of Christ and an apostle of Christ. There were five hundred disciples; there were only a few that became apostles. These hundreds were at peace with God and their own souls and went tranquilly across the years. But there were a few disciples who borrowed temporarily God's spiritual omnipotence, and they went out through the world on a spiritual crusade, knocking down tyrannies, destroying social crimes, turning upside down the whole world of ignorance and sin. A disciple is a pupil, study... An apostle is a workman who has passed f... learning to achievement. For three years the ... hundred were disciples before Christ's death, ... they were content to remain disciples all the res... their lives. But there were a few who felt t... three years was long enough for disciples... After that they stretched up their hands ... plucked the sword of omnipotence out of the ha... of God, a sword red with insufferable wrath agai... sin, and went forth to slay iniquity. Water ... always water, you say. By no means. The ... drops are water, lying in the quiet little pool, or ... Lake Erie. But the energy of Lake Erie is lat... and unreleased. Now, let the water of the la... pour over Niagara Falls, and suddenly it ... comes dynamic and apostolic, lighting distant ... lages, working distant factories, carrying burd... for tired workmen. Thus the truth of Christ w... a latent and static truth in the five hundred di... ples, who were content to be redeemed themselv... but it was dynamic truth in Paul, who went for... to reform; in Peter, who looked upon every ... as a pulpit into which he could climb to evangeliz... in James, who went forth with tireless energy ... care for the widow and the orphans; in John, w... went forth among the turbulent, warring mu... tudes to whisper to each combatant, "Little ch... dren, love one another, for love is of God." For ... is this spiritual energy of God that changes a di... ple into an apostle.

History is full of these occasional men who a... tempt impossible things. History also tells us th... the men who attempted the impossible were su... cessful in their exploits. One of the obligations ... a man is to perform the impossible. Every man... duty is always greater than his ability. When t... mother stands the child, one year old, up against ... wall, and commands the child to walk, it is impo... sible for the child to walk, and yet it is the child ... duty. The mother makes a temporary loan of h... strength to a child that is attempting the impo... sible, and the child succeeds, while God makes ... temporary loan of his omnipotence to William th... Silent, to Garrison the emancipator, to Livingst... the missionary, and to Booth the reformer. Wi... finite power they perform infinite deeds. With h... man faculties they work divine achievement... Their manhood was carried up to the *n*th powe... through the influence of Omnipotence.

The Source of Power

This principle explains the singular influence o... some occasional people in the community. Ther... are a few people who seem to have an influence en... tirely disproportionate to their mental gifts, t... their culture or their property. Quietly and unob... trusively they go about, doing their work day by... day; and yet they carry a warm, summery climat... with them, and the roses and lilies of faith an... hope spring up about their feet as they walk u... and down the streets. To the few who know them... best, they seem miracle-workers of creative life... With the passing years this power to transform... their fellows increases with the waning of their... physical strength. Where others grope, they see... clearly. Putting out their hands, they lead the... blind into a path that is henceforth flooded with... light. Sometimes they stand in silence, with fin... gers upon their lips, as if they heard from afar the... faint but clear music rolling in from God's rich... sky. And listening, lo, their companions, whose... ears have hitherto been deaf, suddenly begin to... catch the first faint notes of that melody so pierc... ingly sweet. The greatness of these occasional men... and women is the greatness of God in them. The... inventor uses the physical forces of God. Paul u... the spiritual forces of God. These gentle disciples... do all things through Christ who doth strengthen... and make the soul equal to any emergency. To... morrow, O man and woman, thou shalt come to the... parting of the ways. To-morrow will bring an im... possible burden, but to-morrow will also bring the... will to act upon God's offer to lend you his infinite...

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, November 2. James 1: 1-8. "A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways." If two men are at the wheel, with opposing notions of direction and destiny, how will it fare with the boat? If an orchestra have two conductors, both wielding their batons at the same time, and with conflicting conceptions of the score, what will become of the band? And a man, whose mind is like that of two men, flirting with contrary ideals at the same time, will live a life "all sixes and sevens," and nothing will move to purposeful and definite issues. If the mind flirt with Satan and Christ, life will be filled with disastrous instability and confusion.

The first thing we need, therefore, for influential and impressive living is unanimity. Unanimity in the mind is the primary factor in a forceful life. To bring "all that is within me" into concord, to make every instrument of the soul bow to one conductor, to lead all the powers into homage to the Lord—this is the unanimity which assures the perfection of holiness. "Unite my heart to fear thy name." That is the mood which wins life's prize, "the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

MONDAY, November 3. Romans 14: 7-21. "Whether we live, we live unto . . ." Unto what? In what direction are we living? Whither are we going? How do we complete the sentence? "We live unto money!" That is how many would be compelled to finish the record. Money is their goal, and their goal determines their tendency. "We live unto pleasure!" Such would be another popular company. "We live unto fame!" That would be the banner of another regiment. "We live unto ease!" Thus would men and women describe their quests. "Unto" what? That is the searching question which probes life to its innermost desire.

"For whether we live, we live unto the Lord." That was the apostle's unfailing tendency, increasing in its momentum every day. He crashed through obstacles in his glorious quest. He sought the Lord through everything and in everything. When new circumstances confronted him, his first question was this: Where is Christ in all this? He found the right way across every trackless moor by simply seeking Christ. He lived "unto the Lord," he always moved in that direction, and when he came to die, the movement continued, and he died "unto the Lord," into the glorious presence of the Christ.

TUESDAY, November 4. I Corinthians 10: 23-33. "Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatever ye do, do all to the glory of God." And so all my days would constitute a vast temple and life would be a constant worship. This is surely the science and art of holy living, to relate everything to the Infinite. When I take my common meal, and relate it to "the glory of God," the common meal becomes a sacramental feast. When my labor is joined "unto the Lord," the sacred wedding turns my workshop into a church. When I link the country lane to the Saviour, I am walking in the garden of Eden, and paradise is restored.

The fact of the matter is, we never see anything truly until we see it in the light of the glory of God. Set a dull duty in that light and it shines like a diamond. Set a bit of drudgery in that light, and it becomes transfigured like the wing of a starling when the sunshine falls upon it. Everything is seen amiss until we see it in the glory! And therefore it is my wisdom to set everything in that light, and whether I eat or drink, or whatever I do, to do all to the glory of God.

WEDNESDAY, November 5. I Corinthians 9: 19-27. "I keep under my body." The body is a good servant but a bad master. In Tennyson's Vision of Sin, he speaks of a soul > that would have flown

> But that his heavy rider kept him down.

The body was riding the soul, and life was topsy-turvy. But this vivid line describes multitudes of people. The horse has become the rider; the ass has got the reins! Fleshly craving has beaten down spiritual desire, and the thing with wings is bearing material burdens through the mire.

So it is imperative that we "keep the body under." It cannot be done for a wish; it can only be done with a will, and with a will endowed with the energies of grace. We shall have to use the whip, and firm restraint, and sometimes the rigors of severe denial. The body must not be allowed any license. It must be honored but never worshiped. We can give it sanctity but never sovereignty. The body must be always and everywhere the servant of the soul, and when the soul says "Do this!" the servant must do it.

THURSDAY, November 6. Ephesians 5: 11-21. "Be not drunk with wine, but be filled with the Spirit." There is no stimulant like spiritual inspiration. Men seek exhilaration in wine when the only real exhilaration is found in "the river of water of life." They get a "pick-me-up" for the body while the soul remains heavy as lead. What is the use in exciting the body when the real springs of vitality are sealed? But it is our folly to magnify the body and to minimize the soul, and we think we only want fresh air when we really need a new heart.

The Spirit of the Lord brings the secret life which turns heaviness of heart into the fresh joy of the morning. The only true sparkle of life is born of His communion; it comes not from a cistern but from a spring. It is "the joy of the Lord" that is exhilarant, and that thrills the soul as with the pulse of recreation. Let us believe more confidently in the ministry of the Spirit for dealing even with jaded nerves and physical depression, and ignore those perilous stimulants that lift us only to drop us again in deeper pits of weakness and despair.

FRIDAY, November 7. Jeremiah 35: 6-14. Who would have dreamed that the abstinence of the Rechabites would have concerned the Lord of Hosts? It is significant of the great fact that my care of the body is of moment to the Lord. My carelessness of the flesh adds to the burdens of the spirit. My irregularity interferes with my bodily health. My excesses dull its senses and make its movements sluggish. And so the soul's instrument is impaired, like an astronomer with an impaired telescope, or like cavalry with jaded and worn-out steeds.

And so does the Lord God regard reverence for the body as acceptable worship. Fasting is proclaimed as a means of grace. Abstinence is esteemed as a minister of spiritual growth. Part of my prayer-life should be the hallowed care of my body. "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost?" I must treat my body as a sanctuary, as a cathedral, keeping it spotlessly free from sacrilege, and arranging all its passions and cravings in the supreme interest of the soul. "Hallowed be my body!" That should ever be included in our supplications at the throne of grace.

SATURDAY, November 8. Leviticus 10: 1-10. "Put difference between the holy and the unholy." The peril of our day is that so many of these differences are growing faint. The holy merges into the unholy, and we can scarcely see the dividing line. Black merges into white through manifold shades of gray. Falsehood slopes into truth through cunning expediences and white lies. Lust merges into purity through conviviality, and geniality, and good fellowship. So is one thing losing itself in another, and vivid moral distinctions are being obscured and effaced.

There is only one way to keep these native contrasts in vivid relief, and that is by living in the unsullied light of God's holy presence. "In Thy light shall we see light." Things are seen in their true colors only when we bring them before the great white throne. Fabrics seen in the gas-light reveal quite other shades when we bring them into the light of day. We must not make our distinctions in the gas-light of worldly standard and expediency; we must take them into His presence before whose radiance even the angels veil their faces, and we shall see things as they are, and we shall know "the difference between the holy and the profane."

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913

wisdom and power against a critical hour, big with destiny for all you love!

In these days when men are talking about the influence of the church in the community, this principle assumes singular importance. One-half of society is talking about equipment tools, kindergartens, social settlements, clubs, gymnasiums, and the other half of the church is talking about the enduement of power, and the divine tides coming in upon the soul of man. It is as if one man should look at the electric bulb and say, "We need better electric fixtures," while the other man looks at the dynamo in the basement and remembers only "the invisible current." The central fact is that for light and heat we need both. The new message means new social devices, better physical life, higher wages, juster laws, a diffusion of all good things, but it means also and primarily the life of God in the soul of man. The relation between the church and the world is the relation between the sun and the tropics and arctics. God warms the flood of waters at the tropic center, and the great circular movement begins. The warmed waters and the Gulf current of air start north toward the Labrador and England, and the cold Arctic current and air start south toward the glowing tropic center to have the chill of death taken away. Then, when the cold is made warm and quick, it starts north itself to bring life to the very regions from which once it had its death, while the warm Gulf Stream that is now chill and cold turns south again to the warm brooding of the sun above.

So the movement under the law of circularity goes ever on, in God's physical world, as a perpetual symbol of the life of the soul that is warmed by the love of God. Filled with the compassion of Christ, the man God goes out during the week into the street chilled by selfishness and frozen with sin to pour the rich tropic tides of love and compassion upon a winter-clad world. It is the life of God that releases the frozen roots and the chilled seeds to their summer's growth; it is the spirit of God that is warmth, release, growth, life, to the frozen hearts of men. It is this brooding life and love of God that brings summer to the soul and makes faith and hope indigenous. What man needs is to be carried up to the *n*th power of influence and personal worth. Borrowing, therefore, God's physical energy as an inventor, multiplying each average man by a hundred men through the infinite strength of God to help us bear life's burdens, conquer its temptations, and fulfil its tasks, we can make the earth to be once more an Eden garden, a veritable heaven of righteousness and peace.

ESPERANTO CONGRESS AT BERN

BY EDMOND PRIVAT

THE Ninth Universal Congress of the International language, Esperanto, was opened at Bern recently by Colonel Emil Frey, a former president of Switzerland. He said, in his opening address, it was a wonderful thing to see twelve hundred people from more than thirty different countries meet in the Swiss capital and hold a Congress in one language. Especially so as the Swiss are accustomed to many conventions and many conferences, where the many languages spoken, or the bad pronunciation of English, German, or French by those of other nations, entirely spoiled the meetings and the best part of the work, as people were unable to understand all that was said.

"To initiate and keep alive such a common tongue is one of the greatest services that can be done mankind. It will be a bridge over the most tremendous obstacles, a bridge that will enable the nations to reach the highest aim attainable in the great world family: tolerance. Tolerance in international life means the end of enmity and hatred. It is the first step toward brotherhood and love."

Such was the conclusion of Colonel Frey's opening speech, after which a gold medal was presented to the author of Esperanto, Dr. Zamenhof, in commemoration of last year's jubilee of his language, which had been in use then for twenty-five years.

Three American States were represented—Maine, Massachusetts and Connecticut. There were a number of delegates from China and Japan and from the Malay Islands. During the course of the convention the twelve hundred delegates marched through the city of Bern and stopped before the Swiss Government Palace to sing in Esperanto the national anthem. It was an impressive sight to watch this long procession of men and women from all parts of the world, with more than twenty-seven different national flags, but all speaking a common language.

The president of the University of Bern, who was rather skeptical as to the possibilities of Esperanto, came incognito to one of the meetings and was greatly impressed by the "extraordinary ease with which all the speakers expressed thmselves, and especially with the lack of strong differences of accent and pronunciation which one would expect."

Many of the hotels in Bern were filled with Esperantists, and several shops had their windows entirely arranged with special shows and price no in Esperanto, while they had taught some of t clerks to speak the language. A play, writte Esperanto by a Swiss poet, was performed in theater by the Flemish actors of the Royal The of Antwerp.

No other language was used throughout all meetings, either business or social. Such quest as the fight against jingoism, the protection young travelers, the establishment of an inte tional stamp, were discussed at the tings of the Universala Esper Asocio, which is a most influential b with delegates and consuls in thirt hundred cities of the world. Two hund Esperanto papers and reviews w represented at the Congress. Th were also two public meetings of Internacia Scienca Asocio, at wh well-known scientists like Profe Cotton of Paris University and Stromboli of Genoa delivered lecture Esperanto on new discoveries. Sunday large congregations atten the three religious services in Es ranto at the Presbyterian Temple, Roman Catholic Church and the Jew Synagogue.

On the last evening of the Congr an enthusiastic audience cheered w great fervor a French general and German counselor, who shook hands the platform, after making two no speeches, in which they expressed th gratefulness that Esperanto had abled French and Germans to meet friendly intercourse and helped them know and appreciate each other bett After the year of constant fear of w which the inhabitants of France a Germany have just passed throu such a sight was very comforting a encouraging indeed to the represen tives of those countries.

NEW ANNALS OF BRAVERY

THE FIGHT ON THE BURNING "VOLTURNO" STAMPS CAPTAIN INCH AND HIS OFFICERS WITH GREAT HEROIS SURVIVORS REACH PORT WITH FULL STORY OF DISASTER

NO BRAVER tale of strife on land or sea was ever told than that which the survivors of the burned liner Volturno brought into port. It was not until the full story of that night and day of suspense between death by fire and death by water was told that the quiet, unassuming heroism of the officers of the Volturno became known. It was not until the photographs taken by passengers on the various rescue ships were shown that those ashore caught the thrill of this latest triumph of wireless. Our very souls stand in awe of this magic that can summon from the vast loneliness of the deep a circle of eleven sturdy ships standing by to save.

The story was told in many parts. The captain and the second and third officers told simple tales of duty done to the utmost. From passengers, from members of the crew, and from those on the rescue ships came the bits of color that mark this as an epic of the sea. The wireless story of the disaster was confirmed. A tank of chemical oil in No. 1 hold exploded at 4.30 on Thursday morning. Third Officer Walter Dusselman took charge of the fight against the flames, but in spite of splendid efforts the fire spread to the baggage hold and hold No. 2. Captain Inch realized that he was fighting for the lives of his passengers and his ship, so he took charge in person. There he stayed in the front rank of the fire-fighters until dawn of the next day, when, blinded, burned and exhausted, he was so helpless that he could not even feed himself and had to be carried down the rope ladder, the last man to leave his ship.

For a brief time it seemed that the fire was coming under control. Then came another explosion, and in an instant No. 1 hold was a solid mass of flames. The watertight doors from that compartment were closed. The heat melted them. Captain Inch went down into the inferno and whenever a man drew back from a dangerous task, he himself rushed forward and did it. His eyebrows were singed, his hair was burned. His clothes smoldered here and there and broke into flames as sparks touched them.

The flames ate steadily along. They crept into No. 2 hold and then licked their way up into the first and second cabin dining saloons above.

At seven o'clock the fire had gone into the smoking rooms. Then still another explosion shook the vessel's hull and the officers knew they were doomed unless help came. When No. 2 hatch collapsed Captain Inch said calmly: "I guess the Volturno is done for."

It was then that Second Officer Lloyd and Third Officer Dusselman tried to get Captain Inch to st work long enough to eat. "If we're saved there be plenty of time to eat," he said, "and if we aren I won't be hungry."

A little time was gained by closing the wate tight doors between No. 2 and No. 3 holds. The came the message from the Carmania that she w on her way to the rescue at full speed ahead, a the engines of the Volturno were used only f fighting fire after that. It grew hotter and hott in the stokehole until finally the men, whose trad it was to bear heat, could stand it no longer. Mo men joined the stokers from the fire-fighting forc It was not cowardice, Mr. Dusselman said, but th refusal of flesh and blood to stand more. But th officers stood it. They remained until they wer almost alone and then they went on deck.

In the meantime the wireless operators had bee sending out their S O S signals. The Carmani was first to pick them up and the Seydlitz second Dawn of Friday found the stricken liner su rounded by the Carmania, La Touraine, the Min neapolis, the Rappahannock, the Czar, the Narr gansett, the Devonian, the Kroonland, the Gross Kurfürst, the Seydlitz and the New York, the latte being a tank steamer with a small crew and n wireless that had just blundered upon this traged f the high seas. The waves ran seemingly too high for a small boat to live, nd through Thursday afternoon the vind blew a hurricane. Officer Dusselman set out for the chart room to consult he barometer. Just as he stepped on he bridge a great tongue of flame shot ut of No. 1 hold and set off a case of ockets and Coston signals. They went ff with a mighty roar, and the officer vas blown into the air and landed on allours on the forward deck, ten feet beow. His hands and knees were badly urned.

About this time the passengers began o jump overboard to leeward. As they jumped, the ship, swept along sideways by the wind, went over them. When the women jumped their skirts filled with water and they sank. Those who went under the ship and the women did not come up again.

The decks had long since become too hot to stand still on. Passengers were clinging to the rails and other supports trying to keep their feet from the decks. While the big liners were maneuvering about, believing that a lifeboat could not possibly live in the hurricane, a daredevil little flat-bottomed rowboat put off from the New York. Three men were in the boat. They rowed near the Volturno and picked up people struggling in the water. They took what they could and then came back for more. After several trips the little boat still hung about, indifferent to the storm.

Second Officer Lloyd then put off from the Volturno in a lifeboat manned by a volunteer crew consisting of two sailors, a fireman and a sixteen-year-old steward. Mr. Lloyd said: "We slid down into the boat by ropes. It was an experiment to see if other boats could live in the sea. I would not take any passengers, as I would not risk their lives on such a trip." The boat picked up several of the passengers who had jumped overboard and then returned.

The boats from all the surrounding ships were used in picking up survivors and in taking the rescued from the burning ship. After every one had gone, Captain Inch satisfied himself that the little group of officers and sailors about him were all that were left, and then allowed himself to be helped down the rope ladder to one of the Kroonland's boats.

Edward Lloyd, the second officer who played such a heroic part, spoke modestly of his own exploits, but his praise was loudly sung by the cabin passengers of the Grosser Kurfürst upon which he was brought into port. "At nine A.M.," he said, "I saw that the wireless was out of commission. The controlling guide ropes were a mass of flames, and I could see that our communication soon would be cut off. I did not think of danger, but just climbed the foremast. It was the only thing to do. With one hand gripping the slippery mast, I guided the falling wires to their proper grooves and adjusted the delicate mechanism. Just as I completed the task my hands, numb with cold, slipped. I fell to the deck, about twenty feet below. My hands and shoulders were slightly cut. I felt no pain. I seemed to be in another world and all around me were the cries and prayers of the women. At eleven A.M. Captain Inch sent calls to the Carmania and other ships. These replied that such a heavy sea was running they could not launch boats."

Captain Barr of the Carmania was rather severely criticized before Captain Inch arrived, for his seeming negligence in not lowering boats. This criticism was entirely offset by Captain Inch's statement. As soon as the subject was broached to him he said: "I want to say that the Carmania did the very best she could. I have nothing but praise and gratitude for those gallant seamen who steamed full speed to the assistance of my poor ship, and this includes Captain Barr and the Carmania."

Further in the course of his story Captain Inch denied absolutely that there was any serious panic aboard the Volturno. He stated that both his passengers and crew behaved splendidly. "I never used a revolver," he said, "or any other weapon to cow the passengers. As a matter of fact, my pistol was burned up in the wreckage of the bridge." The captain was very sad over the loss that was entailed by the early attempt to use the lifeboats. He stated that it was his duty to provision the boats and make the attempt. The first boat, commanded by Chief Officer Miller, was immediately lost. The second, in command of Fourth Officer Langsell, has undoubtedly gone down.

The strain under which the captain was working is indicated by this paragraph from his detailed story of the disaster: "Pennington, the first wireless operator, came to me and I told him to go back and keep the S O S going while I got the ship's position. All this time the crew were getting the boats ready for launching, and the explosions were following one after the other. The third explosion wrecked the steering gear and put the compass out of commission. The midships hospital was wrecked, but so far as I have been able to find out no one, either among the passengers or the crew, was injured by the explosions."

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

"Be Ye Also Ready"

IT IS an old proverb that lightning never strikes twice in the same place. When one extraordinary accident has taken place, we do not expect to hear of another of the same sort for many years. After the Titanic went down, although many timid travelers felt a new reluctance about going to sea, there was a contrary feeling of extra security. The sea had done its worst, and would be less greedy for a time.

Yet in little more than a year news of a tragedy even greater in its horror, though less in the number of its victims, flashed through the air to the wireless needles and brought another shock of grief to the civilized world. A ship at sea, on fire, in a storm! Great vessels standing by unable to come near on account of the high seas; rescue boats beaten back by the waves; lifeboats from the doomed vessel dashed to pieces and lost; more than a hundred lives sacrificed again to the lust of the sea!

They started with high hopes, these sojourners toward the Western land. Friends had gone before; they, too, would make the journey safely. Yet, instead of life in the new land, there came death in the sea. We are scarcely more safe, any of us, in the midst of our daily toil. The end comes suddenly, here and there, to many whom we know and to multitudes whom we know not. It will come sooner or later to us. Whether abruptly, or with due warning, death will find and conquer us.

What then? What next? What after that? What about that other world to which death will take us? It is not old-fashioned and abnormal and untactful and ill-advised to say it. It is not only the message of the Book and of the Saviour. It is the message of the daily newspaper; it is the message of life; it is the message of the sea and of the sky and of the land: "Be ye also ready."

Two kinds of readiness we should possess; readiness to meet death, unafraid and unashamed; readiness to help others who are in peril and unprepared. The matter has been agitated since the Volturno's tragedy of compelling every sea-going vessel to have a mortar lifeline. The small boats could not get near enough to rescue the doomed passengers; the great vessels could not come near enough to throw a line. They could have shot lines over the burning vessel and so expedited the work of rescue if they had been equipped for it.

Are we equipped, are we at our best for saving others? That is our business. Are we in possession of all the helps and powers we might receive? Are we using them? If a sudden call should come from a soul in distress, are you ready to help him find salvation? All that you need for this work is yours for the asking. Souls all about you need your help. "Be ye also ready," ready to aid, ready to rescue, ready to bring them home!

William Sulzer

BY THE vote of the high court of impeachment William Sulzer has been removed from the honorable and dignified office of governor of the State of New York. He was convicted by an overwhelming majority on articles one, two and four of the impeachment, covering respectively the charges of false statement of his campaign contributions, perjury in his declaration to the secretary of state, and threats to prevent witnesses from testifying before the legislative investigating committee. The charge of bribery was not sustained, and the court voted unanimously against his political disqualification from holding office hereafter. Presiding Judge Edgar M. Cullen was the only member of the Court of Appeals who voted in his favor. From the beginning of the trial, it has been practically a foregone conclusion that conviction would be the outcome. William Sulzer has had a meteoric career. He was something of a public idol, and among the masses of the people was believed to be a man of integrity. Had he kept his personal record clean and free from reproach, he could not have been successfully assailed, and would have been impregnable against the assaults of Tammany. Blindly reckless of consequences, he put himself in jeopardy through his own inexcusable follies, which his enemies utilized to advantage. His downfall and all the revelations that led up to it prove the truth of the old adage that no man can escape from the consequences of his own acts. Sulzer himself wove the net that caught him and exposed his guilt, which, like many another, he hoped might remain forever hidden. The people had taken him on trust at his own estimate and they were deceived. He lacked the poise, the moral caliber, the stanch integrity which they had a right to expect of one who held the highest office in a great State, and once in the toils his downfall became inevitable. The lesson of the case is one which may well be heeded by public officials everywhere, and emphasizes the priceless value of a clean record.

The New Tariff and Prices

CONGRESSMAN UNDERWOOD, the leading exponent of the new tariff, has gone on record as affirming that it will save to consumers $1,000,000,000, and that "the free list alone should approximately save some $500,000,000." Secretary of State Bryan says the tariff will not only increase wages and production, but will improve quality and lower prices, though not to the same extent to the consumer that they are reduced to the trade. A canvass of leading Eastern merchants shows a general agreement of opinion that a reduction of from five to ten per cent. in retail prices of wearing apparel may be looked for, accompanied by an improvement in quality. This would seem to be reassuring, but it is not well to expect immediate favorable results. Some of the larger manufacturers are not so optimistic, the truth being that they are not yet clear as to the effect of the tariff changes. The wisest attitude is one of patience, so that the new order of things may have a fair chance to be tested out in the business world.

Huerta as Dictator

AFFAIRS in Mexico go from bad to worse. Huerta's assumption of dictatorship; his violent raid on the assembly, and the arrest and imprisonment of over a hundred deputies who would not yield obedience to his command for the suppression of free speech and who refused to apologize for their strictures on the government or to retract them; his quarrel with his cabinet and his blustering attitude in the face of protests from the legations, all add to the difficulties of a very complicated situation. Neither the United States nor any other Power has any quarrel with Mexico or the people of that misgoverned republic. In common with the other nations affected, though in a larger degree, we are concerned with but one man—who has usurped power by violence, and destroyed the freedom of speech, the liberty and the safety of his own countrymen, as well as jeopardizing the lives and property of foreigners. Pledged to uphold constitutional government and to give a fair electio has repudiated his solemn promises, betrayin best interests of his country and offending all are the true friends of Mexico. In the eyes civilized nations Huerta's course is a crime ag the republic. As Senator Bacon has tersely the dictator is "riding to a fall." In prepar for possibilities, the legations have asked their ernments to send warships, that there may b available force to act as legation guards. P dent Wilson's latest cautionary message to Hu elicited no response. The recent developm have convinced the English Government of the tire justification of our refusal to recog Huerta's administration, and it may be added t since the dictator unmasked and revealed his character, other governments have come to see situation in a new light. Consequently, the cor co-operation of the Powers most interested can be depended upon. The present situation car last. It may be, fortunately, that the patriot and judgment of the Mexican people, rising t full appreciation of the danger, will lead them avert the crisis which Huerta seems recklessly invite.

Archbishop Ireland Answered

ELSEWHERE in this issue we publish the fi part of a notable article by Professor Dau, reply to certain statements by Archbishop Irela the distinguished Roman Catholic prelate, made the course of his recent address in Milwaukee. Pr Dau's treatment of the points at issue is dignif and scholarly, and, withal, so conclusive that it mu be accepted by every fairminded and intelligent ci zen as a complete refutation of the archbisho assertions. The professor convicts him out of l own mouth, showing the inconsistencies of his rece attempt to prove that Rome is not seeking politic power in the United States, when, a few years ag he publicly admitted the opposite view. Pub speakers should have long memories. When the el quent prelate spoke with so much sentiment a feeling in Milwaukee, he had apparently forgott his championship of papal sovereignty in 1901 a 1904. The professor has rendered a signal servi by his latest addition to the literature of this gre national controversy, and has again demonstrate his ability to cope with the ablest apologists of Ron on their own platform. We commend his article every one who believes in keeping religion out politics, and in preserving the republic from th threatened danger of religious domination.

The Triumph of the Wireless

NO BETTER demonstration could possibly hav been made of the value of the wireless telegra phy at sea than happened in the Volturno disaste If the burning steamer had not been equipped wit the system, the probability is that not a soul o board would have been saved. When the neares of the rescuing fleet received the call for help, i was from sixty to seventy miles distant. It sprea the call and all the rescuers arrived in time. Afte they reached the scene of the disaster, as far as ca be learned, not a single life was lost. Thus, al the saved owe their lives wholly, under providence to wireless telegraphy. This is so conclusive a argument in favor of fitting all ocean-going vessels with a wireless outfit that it admits of no discussion. After the Titanic disaster, a loud demand was made for universal equipment: yet we learn that there are vessels that still go to sea without this vital safeguard. The time has come for a compulsory law, including all the maritime nations, making such equipment universal. In the present condition of ocean travel, there is hardly a spot on the wide waste of waters from which a message cannot be sent, with the confident expectation of bringing help in time to save human life.

GERMAN AIRSHIP DISASTER

THE worst catastrophe in the annals of German aviation occurred on October 17, when the latest and largest Zeppelin, L-II, was set on fire by three explosions just outside Berlin, and was completely destroyed. Twenty-eight officers and men, including members of the Admiralty Board, were killed in the disaster. Among these men were Lieutenant Commander Behnisch, a close personal friend of Emperor William, two naval constructors, two naval engineers and three engineer secretaries. The ship was flying at a height of about six hundred feet when three explosions occurred in rapid succession, and the great craft fell, a blazing wreck. Such was the force of the explosions that hundreds of windows were shattered.

New Chinese President Inaugurated

ON OCTOBER 10 Yuan Shi Kai was inaugurated president of the Chinese Republic. The inauguration was surrounded with Oriental magnificence. It was attended by throngs of distinguished Chinese and foreign officials, diplomats and military officials, and took place in the interior of the Taiho Palace, in which many of the Ming and Ching emperors had been crowned. The ceremony was carried out in the vast building called the Taiho Tien or Hall of Supreme Peace, high up on triple terraces of marble, decorated everywhere with dragons and imperial gold. It was here that the emperor was wont to receive New Year greetings from the princes. The Chinese officials wore colored silks of many hues, but the members of the Chinese Parliament were dressed in Western frock coats and silk hats. The chiefs of the foreign legations were carried to the ceremony, like the president, in chairs on men's shoulders. While the inauguration exercises were in progress the greatest sensation was produced by the arrest of Chen, the chief of the Peking mounted police, charged with the intention of assassinating the new president while taking the oath of office. He confessed that the southern rebels had bribed him to assassinate Yuan during the ceremony. The first suspicion was aroused when Chen insisted on getting so much nearer to the president than his place on the program called for. Several bombs were found in Chen's house. It was a fortunate escape for the president and the nation, as it seems that Yuan is the most capable and logical one to lead the new republic. In his inaugural address President Yuan Shi Kai avowed his intention of maintaining a firm and steady policy, and that, in compliance with the requirements of time and circumstances, efforts should be made to unite the people in their march along the path of progress. He declared his conservatism in wishing to preserve that which is best in the old China, promising such reforms demanded by Western civilization as were practicable. He declared his desire and hope for universal peace among nations. Prince Pu Lun, former president of the National Assembly, on behalf of the emperor, the imperial family and the Manchu people, offered his congratulations and assured Yuan of Manchu good will and cooperation. It looks as though a divine providence that has been hastening the progress of the world with marvelous celerity intends to establish in China not only the outer forms but the inner spirit of our Western civilization, which is Christ, and thus go a long way toward solving the problem of the world's redemption. The vital relation between Christianity and an ideal republic is declared in the words which apply to nations as well as to individuals:

If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed. (John 8: 36.)

Altman's Collection to Museum

BY THE will of Benjamin Altman, the late New York dry goods merchant, just filed, his art collection, with an estimated value of $10,000,000 or more, is left to the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City. He also left $150,000 for the care of the collection. The paintings, porcelain, enamels, etc., that the multi-millionaire had been thirty years in collecting are worth twice as much as any single bequest ever given to the museum. Among the collection there are thirteen recognized Rembrandts. The director of the museum said: "Either for its money value, for its high quality, or for its educational importance, I consider Mr. Altman's bequest by far the most splendid gift a citizen ever has made to the people of New York or to the museum. Its value is incalculable." For a man so busy with the materialities of life to spend so much time and money in the realm of the ideal is beautiful indeed, and his giving back to the people some of the millions he has received from them is just. There is no language to estimate the worth of such a gift of art. There is a mental and spiritual nature that requires food. The thoughts of God are the sustenance furnished.

Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. (Matt. 4: 4.)

Ancient Schoolbooks Discovered

PROFESSOR LANGDON of Oxford, England, who is spending some time at the University of Pennsylvania, has discovered that one group of the famous Nippur tablets stored at the university are in reality the oldest schoolbooks known to exist. They show that the children of the ancients learned much that the boys and girls of to-day have to study. According to these tablets the children of 4,200 years ago were taught arithmetic, geography, history and grammar just like the children of to-day. The multiplication tables are remarkably distinct, and in plain numerals show the incontrovertible fact that three times one are three and five times one are five. On one tablet the schoolboy had been given a lesson in phonetic signs corresponding to the shorthand of modern times. The Summerians, the authors of these tablets at the Pennsylvania University, also invented the use of writing syllables and combining them into words, being the first step toward the alphabet. Writing on stone tablets was in use among the Hebrews. There is this record of the truth on stone tablets so necessary to the tuition and salvation of the race:

And he wrote on the tables, according to the first writing, the ten commandments, which the Lord spake unto you in the mount out of the midst of the fire, in the day of the assembly; and the Lord gave them unto me. (Deut. 10: 4.)

Prince Katsura Passes Away

PRINCE TARO KATSURA, three times prime minister of the Japanese Empire, who died recently, has played a most important part in the wonderful advance of Japan during the past generation. During the troublous times of the restoration of the emperor to power in 1867, he took his place among the imperial forces as a young officer, just out of his teens. He remained in army life, advancing steadily until, during the war with China in 1894-95, he was commander of one of Japan's victorious armies. As full general in the army he retired from active service and entered upon a most eventful career as the leading statesman of Japan. He was prime minister in fact as well as name during the Russo-Japanese War, his military experience and his knowledge of statecraft contributing largely to the victorious results of that war. When the Meiji emperor died a year ago, after a beneficent reign of forty-five years, Prince Katsura left the political arena to become the grand chamberlain, the intimate personal adviser of the new Emperor Yoshihito. This would have rounded out a career of signal service to the empire, but for some reason he again returned to the field of politics as prime minister. Japan just at that moment was witnessing an interesting struggle between the army party and the dominant political party in Parliament. Katsura attempted to rule without a party behind him. Failing in this he tried to gather a personal party behind him. He failed, too, in this. There was rioting and some bloodshed in the early days of this year, and he was forced to resign and make way for Yamamoto, the present premier. A shadow was thus cast over his latter days, but not such as to dim the glory of the service he rendered his emperor during forty-five strenuous years. The sorrow of the people at the removal of their leader suggests the words of the Jewish king:

And the king said unto his servants, Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel? (II Sam. 3: 38.)

Base Ingratitude

A MAN from Little Ferry, N. J., was walking along the bridge over a nearby river in an intoxicated condition the other day, when he stumbled and fell into ten feet of water. The bystanders hastened to his rescue. Some of the men carried grappling irons, others ropes, and one man an oar. For five minutes there was the greatest excitement, and then the drowning man was drawn to the top of the bridge. He was laid on a barrel and rolled back to life again. Just then an ambulance from the hospital, with an accompanying surgeon, came upon the scene. The man in great rage said to the group: "What did you mean by pulling me out when I just went into the water for a quiet swim? I'll thrash the whole lot of you," and he undertook to do so. Intemperance has a long line of cruel ingratitudes against it. Within a surprisingly short time we have had instances of its prompting the son to stab the breast of the mother who nourished him; the husband to kill the wife; the brother to shoot the brother; the father to slay the daughter. What cruel treatment the world gives Christ, who came to rescue! Even those who profess to love him are often ungrateful. We wound him by a thousand falls. We must treat him better than those of whom it is said:

They cried out again, Crucify him. (Mark 15: 13.)

Made His Own Coffin

A CABINET-MAKER of Reno, Nev., died the other day and was buried in a coffin he had fashioned for himself. For twenty years it had a place in the middle of his shop. He might have placed it there as the ancients did the hour-glass to remind him or his customers of their mortality. The reason he gave was that the price of coffins was so high he did not intend that the makers should take advantage of him. If his act shall sound a halt to the unnecessary extravagance of burials, and reduce the high cost of dying as well as of living, the lesson will not have been in vain. The man was over seventy and died suddenly. He obeyed the injunction:

Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. (Matt. 24: 44.)

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Aviator Blown to Sea

THE tenth anniversary of the first flight in a motor-driven aeroplane was celebrated on Columbus Day by an aviation meet at the Oakwood Heights Aerodrome on Staten Island, New York. The most interesting feature of the event was a sixty-mile race round Manhattan Island for prizes aggregating $2,250, offered by the New York Times. Seventeen flyers entered for the race, but only five started. Thousands watched them as they flew steadily and safely in the forty-three mile gale that was blowing. W. S. Lucky, in a 100-horse-power Curtiss biplane, was the winner, receiving a prize of $1,000. Frank Niles, in a similar machine, came second, winning $750, and C. M. Wood, in an eighty-horse-power Moisant monoplane, came third, winning $500. The safe completion of the race in such a high wind was averred a new triumph in aviation. Most of the other entrants in the race were prevented from starting by faulty motors or other mechanical troubles that developed at the last moment. One, however, was the victim of tragedy. Alfred J. Jewel, who was all ready for the race, left his hangar on the Hempstead Plains aviation field early in the morning to fly to Staten Island. At eight o'clock he was seen over the Belmont Park race track, but no news has been received of him since. Other aviators believe that the high wind and fog, combined with his admitted inexperience in long cross-country flights, caused him to lose his way and to be blown out to sea. Every possible effort has been made to find him. The nearby woods and shores and marshes have been scoured by bands of searchers. Former companions have flown over the route he was to have followed, and all the ships at sea and up and down the coast were notified by wireless, but without result. It is the general opinion that Jewel, flying high and lost in the clouds, passed out to sea and has been drowned. He was twenty-seven years old and leaves a wife and three-year-old daughter.

Arkansas to be "Dry"

THE supreme court of the State of Arkansas rendered an opinion on October 11, which will practically prohibit the sale of liquor in that State after December 31 next. The validity of Senate Bill No. 118 was sustained by the court. This bill, passed by the last legislature, requires a petition containing the names of a majority of white adults of any community, after the entire county has been voted wet under local option, before the county judge can grant a liquor license. The negro, a factor in voting many counties wet, was thus excluded.

Errand Boy's $100,000,000 Job

A STORY of the old-fashioned sort, the kind that has stirred the ambition of many an American boy, came to light recently in Chicago. A man who eighteen years ago as a country boy walked into the First National Bank at Sullivan, Ill., and applied for the position of errand boy became the custodian of nearly $100,000,000 when on October 11 Irving Shuman took the oath of office as assistant treasurer of the United States in the Federal building there. Mr. Shuman is now the principal owner of the bank in Sullivan, and is interested in other important banking and commercial enterprises.

Bishops Get Wall Street Surprise

THREE of the Western bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church who have been in attendance upon the convention of that church in New York City received a pleasant surprise in Wall Street a few days ago. Rev. William Wilkinson, who is known in New York as the "Bishop of Wall Street," invited the visitors to assist in one of the noon-day services for workers in downtown offices, which he conducts in Wall Street. Basing opinions on some of the widely circulated stories of the ungodliness of the metropolis, the Western prelates went to the financial district, anticipating a welcome most notable for its frigidity. Instead, they were greeted by a "congregation" which almost blocked the street and which showed a ready interest in the service.

London's New Lord Mayor

SIR THOMAS VANSITTART BOWATER has been elected to succeed Sir David Burnett as Lord Mayor of London, England. At noon on Michaelmas Day the "liverymen" of London City gathered in the Common Hall at Guildhall for this election, which still preserves many of the queer old ceremonies that marked the first similar gathering of the free citizens of London in 1189. The liverymen are the members of London's seventy-six guilds or companies. They now number about seven thousand four hundred and are so called because each guild has its peculiar livery or uniform. To them is delegated the election of the Lord Mayor, the sheriff and the city chamberlain. In accordance with the ancient custom the hustings or election platform was strewn with sweet-smelling herbs. After the Lord Mayor and the aldermen who have "passed the chair" had left the hall, that the voting might be "free and unfettered," the names of Sir Vansittart Bowater, citizen and girdler, and Sir Charles Johnson, citizen and inn-holder, were submitted. By the subsequent voting Sir Vansittart Bowater was elected.

SIR VANSITTART BOWATER

The new Lord Mayor, who is a partner with his brothers in a paper-making firm, was born at Manchester in 1862. He is the second native of Lancashire to hold the office, the other being Sir Nicholas Mosley, whose year of service was in 1599 and 1600. Sir Vansittart was elected sheriff in 1905, and two years later alderman for Castle Baynard Ward. He is a member of the Girdlers' and Loriners' Companies and is a prominent Freemason.

A New Ban on the Aigrette

THE aigrette made from the plumes of the osprey, white heron and bird of paradise is rapidly coming into its own; its own being an unqualified odious reputation. Though late reports state that the recent decision made on this subject by the secretary of the treasury has not had the effect of stopping the importation of aigrettes worn on hats, a far more powerful influence than a prohibitor law has made its appearance. The campaign of education which has produce in so many a feeling of repulsion from these trophies of savage cruelty ha had another highly desirable result. A number of prominent women, man of them members of the woman's auxiliary of the New York Zoological Soci ety, have pledged themselves to a concerted movement for the protection o the birds by whose slaughter the plumes are secured. All of these women ar in positions to influence the designers of fashions to a certain extent, and it i their hope to be able through this channel to so discountenance the wearing o aigrettes that no self-respecting woman will care to use them.

THE DUCHESS OF FIFE PRINCE ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT

A Royal Wedding in England

THE marriage of Prince Arthur of Connaught and the Duchess of Fife took place at noon on October 15, in the Chapel Royal of St. James' Palace. Though the ceremony itself was very simple, the scene was one of great splendor. The old palace had been brilliantly decorated, and there were about three hundred guests, who were gowned in brilliant colors or uniformed in the full dress of British regiments. Great public interest was shown in the marriage, for Prince Arthur has proved himself a brilliant young diplomat, and his father, the present governor general of Canada, is very popular. Thousands of people lined the streets between Buckingham Palace and St. James. The bride's favorite flower, white heather, predominated in all the floral decorations. King George, the bride's uncle, gave her away, and there were five princesses as bridesmaids. Prince Arthur was supported by his father, the Duke of Connaught, and the Prince of Wales. The Archbishop of Canterbury performed the ceremony. The duchess wore a simple gown of white satin charmeuse, embroidered with tiny pearls. Her bridal veil was of tulle embroidered with Brussels lace, and her flowers were orange blossoms and heather.

Severe Storm Sweeps Wisconsin

A VIOLENT windstorm that took the form of a small tornado swept over a portion of southeastern Wisconsin on October 11. Reports of heavy property damage and of several deaths caused by the storm were immediately sent out through Lacrosse. The town of Tomah was practically wiped out. Damage more or less severe is reported from Mauston, Hillsboro, Elroy, Arkdale and Beloit.

New Gold at Nome

MINERS who have worked the beach sands at Nome, Alaska, for gold believe that the recent storm which half destroyed that city brought its own recompense in form of gold-bearing sands that will more than pay for the damage done. The bottom of the sea in front of Nome is known to be rich in gold, but no method of working it has ever been discovered. It has long been a custom for miners to pan the fresh sand cast up by heavy storms and be well repaid for doing so. The captain of the revenue cutter Bear has informed the authorities at Washington that additional assistance was urgently needed at Nome for the sufferers from the storm and flood.

Huerta Becomes Dictator

BOTH branches of the Mexican National Congress were formally declared suspended on October 10 by Provisional President Huerta. The declaration was made after 110 members of the Chamber of Deputies had been arrested and lodged in the penitentiary for signing resolutions of warning to Huerta because of the disappearance of the Senator for Chiapas, Dr. Belisario Dominguez. A proclamation was issued just before midnight calling for new elections of senators and deputies on October 26, the date of the presidential election. Huerta also called upon the Deputies to withdraw the resolution warning him of their intention to dissolve the parliament and hold their sessions elsewhere. The deputies, who had listened sullenly to the reading by Manuel Garza Aldape, the minister of the interior, of General Huerta's reply, moved at its conclusion to refer the president's demand to committee, and a motion was put to adjourn. Minister Aldape interposed an objection, saying that the president required immediate action. At this the deputies demurred and persisted in putting the motion to adjourn. Thereupon the minister of the interior signaled to Chief of Police Chavez, who was stationed on the balcony. The chief came down to the floor of the chamber with 200 police. Señor Aldape then read the names of the signers of the resolution, and as the names were called the deputies were taken into custody. This action was followed within a few hours by a proclamation by which Huerta declared himself dictator of Mexico. The American chargé d'affaires at Mexico City was within two days notified by the administration at Washington to advise the existing powers in Mexico that the election scheduled for October 26 would not be recognized as constitutional by this government. Though there have been, as yet, no pronouncements on this subject from across the Atlantic, it is firmly believed in Washington that the European governments will take similar action.

ROME'S DREAM OF A "CIVIL PRINCEDOM"

"SOME SAY THE POPE OF ROME IS AMBITIOUS OF TEMPORAL POWER OVER AMERICA"

Archbishop Ireland at Catholic Mass-Meeting at Milwaukee, Wis., August 11, 1913, as Reported in "America" (Catholic), August 23, 1913

BY PROF. W. H. T. DAU

TO INSURE its being authentic, the remark at the head of this article has been taken from a Catholic source. The secular press of the country also published it at the time, together with other remarks of Archbishop Ireland on the same subject. The Milwaukee Sentinel of August 12, which gives an extensive outline of the address in which the remark occurred, contains the exact sentence as quoted above, with the single exception that for the word "power" the Sentinel has "rule."

The remark was made in a deprecating spirit. Archbishop Ireland deplores the fact that there are people in our country who say these things of the Pope. He is aware that the same people say a number of other things about the Pope and about the Pope's representatives in our country. They have said that the Pope is ambitious "of planting here the 'yellow and white' instead of the Star-Spangled Banner; that priests and bishops are active agents of his yearning; that Catholics dream of the day when his command in civil and political matters will sway the White House and Capitol; that to accomplish this intent associations are nightly preparing themselves by sanguinary oath and secret drillings to murder their fellow citizens," etc. Archbishop Ireland is so fully convinced of the folly of these people that he does not hesitate to number them with the insane. "I allude to such wild elucubrations of diseased brains only to ask, in unanswered wonderment, how such follies can be thought out and acted upon, even by a handful of men, in the twentieth century, in America. But, of course, the insane are ever with us."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD itself is evidence to the fact that there are such people in the United States as Archbishop Ireland has alluded to. Nobody knows their number. They may be "a handful." In that case Archbishop Ireland could afford to ignore them. There may be insane people among them. Who knows? In that case Archbishop Ireland could afford to show them pity. But all this is of minor importance.

One could wish that Archbishop Ireland had been more discriminating in his enumeration of symptoms of insanity. But this is a common fault of Catholic argument. It seems to have become the authorized form of argument ever since the Council of Trent. In its condemnatory canons the council manages to link truth and error so skilfully that it usually succeeds in rejecting an unpleasant truth while seemingly rejecting only a plain error. A person need not have said half, or even the fourth part, of what Archbishop Ireland charges, and he will still be embraced in the archbishop's sweeping diagnosis for insanity.

The Ambition for Temporal Power

A considerable array of facts has been produced in former issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to substantiate the charge of temporal ambition against the Catholic Church in America. These facts cannot be disposed of by fervid declarations made before an assembly of enthusiastic Catholics, many of whom, no doubt, were ignorant of what has actually been said in the United States by men in the very front ranks of the Catholic hierarchy in our country. Those facts still stand. Archbishop Ireland has not touched a single one of them.

We wish now to show by Archbishop Ireland himself that his church, as represented by himself, is ambitious of temporal power over America. In other words, we wish to prove that Archbishop Ireland as a loyal Catholic churchman is ambitious, and has declared himself ambitious, of temporal power over America. Practically this amounts to saying that if the people of whom Archbishop Ireland has made complaint are insane, Archbishop Ireland himself is a contributory cause of their insanity.

In the North American Review for March, 1901, there appeared an article by Archbishop Ireland on "The Pope's Civil Princedom." This article was reprinted in 1904, in Vol. II, pp. 193-218, of the lectures and addresses of the archbishop, which he has published under the title The Church and Modern Society. The article to which we refer takes its leading thought from an address of Leo XIII to the Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal of England, who with some hundreds of English pilgrims had come to pay the Pope a visit. The Pope had said: "A source of grief in particular is, that the same force which deprived the pontiff of his just and legitimate temporal sovereignty, with which is bound up the freedom of his sacred office, [italics ours], still persecutes and continues to hold him subject to an alien domination." Archbishop Ireland's entire article was written in explanation and justification of this statement of the Pope. He declares at the outset: "The lapse of thirty years since the old Aurelian wall of Rome, near the Porta Pia, crumbled beneath the shot and shell of the Italian artillery, has not put out of sight the question of the Pope's civil princedom; this question clamors to-day for solution as imperiously as at any moment since 1870, and the only solution which will satisfy the pontiff and the faithful of the Catholic Church is the restoration of the temporal power of the Papacy."

The Real Roman Question

One might think that the Pope's grievance is that he was unjustly deprived of property that rightfully belonged to him—a thing that happens not infrequently amid the vicissitudes of war. Such wrongs can be, and are, adjusted in court, after peace has been restored. Any actual damage that was done to papal property by the ravages of war the Italian Government has offered amply to repair, but its generous offers have met with stern and stubborn refusal. This, then, is not the real grievance. Archbishop Ireland, quite correctly, points out that "it is the connection between the Pope's temporal power and the exercise of his spiritual jurisdiction that we must consider, if we are to have a correct apprehension of the Roman question, and understand why it is that this question lives and demands from the twentieth century the solution which it failed to receive from the closing decades of the nineteenth."

Archbishop Ireland informs his American readers: "Civil independence, Catholics maintain, is necessary to the Papacy for the fulfilment of its mission." In days when the church was persecuted, and void of the power which it exercised in more fortunate times, the Papacy did not have "the normal form which it should bear, and the normal rights which it received from Christ." Archbishop Ireland admits that the Papacy can exist "under the stress of most unpropitious circumstances," and "perform its appointed work." He admits that what he terms "civil independence" is "not a vital element in the constitution of the Papacy." It is "necessary only in the sense that without it the Papacy does not possess the dignity and the freedom which it should possess as the representative of Christ and the teacher of nations."

The "Civil Princedom"

To the well-indoctrinated and consistent Catholic the Pope's civil princedom is a dogma of faith, and its constant assertion a matter of conscience. The loyal Catholic, when studying the civil status of the Papacy, must always ask himself the question: What ought our civil status to be? Succumbing to moral inertia, Catholics might say: "Let well enough alone. Let us be content with what we have. We can get along on that." Such talk would be disloyal. "Will any one say that the Papacy, the chieftaincy of Christ's Church, received from its Author only what is absolutely essential to its life and work, and not also the integrity of outward form and the freedom of action which are required for the exercise of its ministry with dignity and efficiency?" says Archbishop Ireland.

This appeal to the Author of Christianity transfers the question of the Pope's civil princedom to the divine records of Christianity for settlement. We should very much like to see Archbishop Ireland prove his assertion from the Scriptures. Until he produces Bible proof for the Pope's civil princedom, we must content ourselves with reviewing his extra-Scriptural arguments.

"Suppose the Pope were in subjection to a civil ruler—his freedom would at most be a concession from the ruler, and there would be no certainty that the concession would not be withdrawn. Such a ruler would have the power to stay the action of the Pope, to put countless obstacles in his way, and, by threats or promises, to exercise influence upon him." This argument places Archbishop Ireland face to face with the question: Can the authority of God and the authority of Cæsar co-exist at a given time and place? Can a follower of Christ be a loyal subject both of the spiritual and the secular authority by refusing to give to either what belongs to the other? If the Pope's domain is purely spiritual, and the ruler's purely secular, there can be no clashing of authorities and no crossing of interests. The divine head of the church stood trial before a heathen judge, and acknowledged that the power of that judge was bestowed from on high. The divine head of the church paid his taxes to the government, and went on with his own mission. His life-battle was not waged against civil rulers in behalf of civil independence and personal prerogatives, but against a wicked hierarchy and in behalf of the truth.

"National antipathies and jealousies, so strong and so persistent in the life of humanity, make it imperative that the head of the church be not the subject of a civil ruler. Inasmuch as the Catholic Church is a universal church, it is vitally different from all other religious societies, and has exigencies to which no other religious bodies lay claim. Because it is the church of all nations, its supreme chieftain must be of no nation; he must have a territory of his own, where all nations are at home, where no nation is master. In virtue of his office the Pope is supra-national, and for this reason he must be extra-national. Were he the subject of any nation, he would be viewed with suspicion by subjects of other nations." Archbishop Ireland considers the disfranchisement of our District of Columbia, because of its being the seat of our national government, an act of much political wisdom. "In this way rulers and legislators are effectually freed from the undue influence of particular States. Similarly, if the traditional metropolis of Christendom were set apart for the government of the church, the Roman pontiff would be above the control or dictation of any civil power, and would be assured the full exercise of the spiritual liberty of his sacred office.

We have here the remarkable statement that Catholics not only cannot tolerate any civil ruler superior to their Papacy, but they cannot suffer any other religious society to be treated as equal to their Papacy. The civil powers and all religious societies on earth must yield to the superior authority of the Papacy. Neither of them can have any claims equal to those of the Papacy. And it is for the benefit of the entire world that the archbishop advocates these claims. His argument is pure, unalloyed cosmopolitan philanthropy. The happiness and the well-being of the nations of this earth require the civil princedom of the Pope. Ay, if men had not read history, they might believe all this. But has not the Papacy been settled in its own secular States for centuries? Has not the condition for the restoration of which Archbishop Ireland pleads existed hundreds of years? By the archbishop's own argument we are justified, yea, we are fairly invited to charge the Papacy with being the cause of all "national antipathies and jealousies," with the wars and persecutions, the misery and the suffering of those ages when the Papacy was just what Archbishop Ireland wants it to be.

When given every opportunity for acquitting itself of its "divine mission," the Papacy has failed ingloriously. The Pope bore himself as the supreme monarch of the world, who considered kings and emperors his vassals. Like a great potentate he was represented at the courts of Europe by nuntios. His personal agents and emissaries kept him closely informed of what was going on at every seat of power. His chancellories and administrative offices at Rome kept files of important documents. This supra- and extra-national Pope, the "beau ideal" of Archbishop Ireland's yearning, the coveted prize of Catholic striving in the twentieth century, has been a very real fact of history some four to nine hundred years ago. Only he was not supra- and extra-national, but proved very much intra-national, and subter-national, and contra-national. He was not above forming treaties with one ruler for the purpose of defeating another; he mustered armies and waged wars. Among the rulers of Europe the "spiritual" Pope could be the most secular. He was head over heels in politics. There was many a secular prince, and many a humble layman, in Christendom more pious and God-fearing than "His Holiness."

We might continue to quote from Archbishop Ireland's interesting article. But since we shall have to crowd into this article much other material, and since the essential features of Archbishop Ireland's argument have been exhibited, we shall rest the case here. If any prominent Catholic churchman in the United States has in clear and unmistakable terms spoken in behalf of the temporal power of the Papacy, Archbishop Ireland is the man. He anticipated dissent from the position he took at the time when he wrote his article; for he concludes with the following remark: "Non-Catholic readers of the North American Review may not admit the premises upon which Catholics are building. They will, however, I am confident, concede that once those premises are granted, the Catholic position on the Pope's civil princedom is the only logical one." This closing remark still left the sanity of non-Catholic readers unassailed. That was commendable. We shall leave Archbishop Ireland to enjoy his logical feat. We shall continue to be amazed at his premises, but we are sure that we have grasped his conclusion: To be in its normal condition, the Papacy must be vested with temporal power.

ENTHUSIASTIC "MONEY-MAKERS"

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

IT WAS dark in the room when I sat down at my desk, dark and gloomy with the gloom of a cloudy day. But as I pulled my pad toward me and began to open letters that my club girls had sent, the sun burst out from behind a cloud, and a great splash of molten gold fell on my desk in a large, shining spot. And I thought, with the tiniest bit of superstition in my heart: "This is a good omen for our club!"

I am going to show you a few of the characteristic letters that have come to me from the eager, interested girls who for almost a year have been my dearest pen-and-ink chums. This letter comes from Indiana, a breezy little note that fits in somehow with the broad level fields of the State:

"I have intended to write to you for a long time, but I waited and waited, for I didn't know that you wanted us to correspond with you. I always read your corner in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and was glad to see the announcement of the new club. What is it to be like? And what will we do? I certainly want to be in it, if possible."

This girl has an idea that I wish you (the "you" applies personally to every one of my friends) would follow. She tells me: "I am sending the addresses of some young ladies who I think would be interested in your money-making club. Will you please send each one of them a booklet? I want to tell you that I hope the club has all kinds of success."

This letter, hurried all the way from Nebraska, comes straight to the point: "I see by my CHRISTIAN HERALD that you are going to start a club, and that girls of seventy might belong. So I write for one of your booklets that tell about it. After I read it I'm sure I shall want to join."

Dear, silver-haired girl of seventy, I hope you will join. And I'm sure you will be very eager to when you have read our plans. For, friends of mine, I don't very well see how you can help wanting to be one of us!

This letter from Illinois sounds very enthusiastic. I'm going to publish all of it.

"Do you know, Miss Sangster, I'm just all excited over this surprise you have in store for us. The shivers of delight just run up and down my spine like lightning. I've guessed and guessed what is in Pandora's box, until my brain is all awhirl. I certainly will be one of the helpers, as money will be very acceptable to me in helping others. I myself have been thinking that some kind of organization would be fine for your friends, but just what kind I didn't exactly know. I'm very much interested in the booklet explaining these pleasant surprises you have in view for all who accept them. Please send me one at once, for to say I'm excited would be putting it mildly. I'm just wild over the thought of such a plan existing. I can hardly wait until I hear from you in regard to this beautiful plan that is going to bring happiness and cheer to others. I think about it all day, dream about it at night, and even begin to feel I'm helping the box to be opened."

This other letter was just given to me by the postman. Guess who sent it! Our own little "Pollyanna," Helen McKenzie. She says:

"It is a long, long time since I wrote to you. I want to belong to the club that I find in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

We followed Pollyanna's advice in the Glad Game. Let's follow her lead in the Money-Makers' Club.

This comes from a "girl" in Pennsylvania. Her letter is very business-like and I know from the tone of it that she is very enthusiastic about our plan. She says: "I wish to join your Money-Makers' Club, for I am one of your girls even though I'm sixty years of age. Please send me your booklet, for I'm sure it will interest me very much."

This letter is from New Jersey. And, like the rest of the letters, it bubbles over with interest and excitement and the pure joy of living.

"Dear Fairy Godmother," it says, "I'm just as excited as can be about the club plan—it does sound so mysterious and fine. I hope you will not think me rude for the name I have given you, for although I have never written to you, I have looked forward to your weekly chats with the greatest delight.

"Perhaps you would like to know a little bit about me. In the first place I'm nineteen years of age and I've been earning my own living for quite a few years. Will it interest you to know that my first subscription to any magazine was THE CHRISTIAN HERALD?

"Now, dear fairy godmother, I must stop now, because I'm very busy. Do send the booklet soon, because I do so want to be one of the girls who will share in the hidden treasure."

I can only show you one more letter. Which shall it be? I am going to shut my eyes and draw an envelope from the huge pile. Here it is:

"I read your page in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every week and enjoy it very much. I have longed to write and become one of your pen-and-ink friends, but kept putting it off. When I read this week's CHRISTIAN HERALD, however, I could not help writing, for I do so want an interest in 'Pandora's box!'"

In the Captain Kidd stories, the pirate used to bury his treasure. And then, to make discovery impossible, he would kill a slave so that there would be a ghost to guard his hidden wealth. Girls, you will find buried treasure all over this land of ours—if you only look for it. Unlike the wicked captain's money, it is good, clean gold, with never a ghost to keep it away from your hands.

Do you want some of the treasure? Then, friends of mine, write to the Money-Makers' Club, and we will help you in your search for it.

nothing sacred and nothing intimate to one's own personal history. I feel simply aghast when I try to imagine what will happen."

Henry Maxwell was very thoughtful. His first excitement had given way to a profound seriousness. Finally he said:

"Edward, don't you think we can leave all that to Him? Do you doubt he will know what to do under all circumstances, just as he did—before?"

Norman actually stared at Maxwell. Then he said with a sigh of relief, "I confess I had not thought of it in that way. I was only thinking of our own newspaper vulgarity and the hasty, superficial treatment of every serious thing. I don't know how it will all come out. But, of course, I don't doubt His own wisdom and ability to face any situation of modern life. Can you make yourself believe that such a marvelous event has really occurred — that Jesus Christ in the flesh is actually living and breathing in Raymond to-night?"

"I believe it without question." Alexander Powers spoke softly, almost as if talking to himself. Throughout the evening he had sat silent, only occasionally uttering a word, deeply absorbed in Martha's answers, observant of all shades of expression, and tense with suppressed feeling. To any one who was familiar with this man's history and the cross he had borne in loyalty to his Lord, it might have been revealed that night that Powers was in a state of exaltation, free from any particle of hesitation or doubt. He had accepted, with a heart that was hungry for a look at its Lord, the entire stupendous statement of Martha from the moment she had exclaimed, "Jesus is here!" and henceforth his entire faith would rest calmly and joyfully on this Person and call him Master and Lord.

Not so Mr. Maxwell. He confessed to Norman and Powers and Mrs. Maxwell and Martha as they remained in the library after the others had gone, that he could not yet bring his mind to accept such an astounding event as a real fact. In spite of his own intense desire for such an appearance, and in spite of all Martha and Mr. Grey had said, he found a region of doubt still existing in his own heart. He found himself murmuring almost mechanically, "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe."

"I accept it wholly!" Alexander Powers's voice broke through Maxwell's reverie. "I believe he is here. I don't doubt my Lord and my God. What an unheard-of joy to see him!"

Tears rained over Alexander Powers's face. His friends understood it. When he and Norman went away, Maxwell said, "Powers, I want to believe as much as you do. And I have a feeling that I shall as soon as I meet him. I am going over to Grey's the first thing in the morning. Did I tell you? The last thing Grey said to me to-night was that—he—the Person—had told him he wanted to see me early to-morrow."

Mr. Maxwell did not sleep that night. And he welcomed the early light. As soon as the simple morning meal was over, he went out. Mrs. Maxwell laid her hand on his arm as he left the house, simply saying, "It will be all right, Henry. Leave it with the Father."

The town looked just the same as always. At that early hour people were still going to work. Maxwell did not take the Gazette, which was an evening paper, but as he passed down through the shop district adjoining the Rectangle, he heard a newsboy crying out something about "Great story! Rectangle church meeting last night! Special edition!"

He refused to buy a copy thrust at him by another boy, as he turned the corner into the street where Grey lived. But when he came up to the house he noticed a number of young men, two with cameras, and recognized them as Gazette reporters.

He walked up to the door and rang the bell. The reporters crowded about him. Grey opened the door. One of the newspaper boys tried to force his way in. Grey politely but firmly blocked his entrance.

"Come in, Mr. Maxwell; we have been waiting for you," he said quietly. He did not even reply to the general clamor of the press representatives to be allowed to get in. As soon as Mr. Maxwell was in the hall, Grey locked the door, then turned, looked at Maxwell with a look of deepest eeling, waited a moment, and then shered him into the sitting-room. Mr. Maxwell's heart beat with tremendous excitement as he saw the person waiting there to receive him.

CHAPTER III

MR. JASPER CARTER, editor and proprietor of the Raymond Evening Gazette, appeared very much annoyed over something which had occurred in the office. It was the morning after the astonishing scene at the Rectangle Church and about two hours after Mr. Maxwell had been admitted to Mr. Grey's house.

Mr. Carter was often annoyed at many things in the course of a day's work at the Gazette office, and his temper was generally at the exploding point. But this morning he was more than usually irritable and out of sorts.

Nothing was going right anywhere. He had succeeded in getting a "scoop" on the News, Mr. Norman's paper, by getting an exceptional early extra describing the meeting at the Rectangle and putting into the "story" all the dramatic touches of which Barnes, his best reporter on the staff, was capable. Barnes had not been present at the meeting, but he wrote a full account of it as if he had been, and even went so far as to describe the appearance of this "visitant from another world." And there were three columns of interviews, garbled and distorted, with members of Grey's church, some of whom had not been present at the meeting. Altogether, the "story" made intensely interesting reading to many in Raymond that morning.

But Mr. Jasper Carter was thoroughly dissatisfied. For some unaccountable reason he had not succeeded in getting any reliable information concerning this mysterious person who claimed to be Jesus. Not even the indefatigable and irrepressible Barnes had really secured anything really tangible. And now for some unaccountable reason there was no report from either Barnes or the new "cub" reporter who had been sent out to secure a picture of the newcomer at all costs. He had sent the "cub" because, as he grimly said, "sometimes these absolutely green hands can get what the old seasoned newspaper veterans can't get. They have a reputation to earn instead of to sustain, and a man will do more impossible feats to earn fame than to keep it up."

The particular "cub" reporter assigned with the veteran Barnes to do this particular work was a young man by the name of Logan. He had claimed to be an expert photographer and Barnes had hired him as an experiment for a week.

Another hour slipped by and Mr. Carter boiled over. He jerked the telephone receiver off the hook and called up Grey's number. But, although he savagely called to central to keep ringing, he received no answer and was just throwing the receiver back when the new reporter came running in.

There was a look on the boy's face that stopped even Carter's oath at the sight of him. As a general thing no reporter, old or young, would have rushed into Carter's office in this fashion, but Carter saw in a second that something tremendous, at least to the boy, had occurred. He held the negative of a photographic plate in his hand, and, after an ineffectual stammer, he exclaimed:

"Mr. Carter — look — at that! I climbed into the kitchen through a window at Grey's and got up on a table and opened a transom and got a time exposure of the man you wanted. He was talking with Mr. Grey and the other man, Mr. Maxwell. I ran all the way back here, and have just come from the developing room. And I ask you to look at that!"

Carter took the bit of glass and held it up to the light. It was perfectly clear, not a shadow of any sort visible.

"Well, what of that—you—" Carter swore. "Something wrong with your plate, or your developing, or your focus. Go out again and don't come back till you get what I sent you for!"

"There was nothing wrong with the plate, the focus or the developing," Logan replied doggedly.

"No! That's right! The only thing wrong is your stupid self. Do you mean to tell me—"

"Mr. Carter!" the boy broke in eagerly, more than in a spirit of resentment at Carter's manner. "I can't understand it. Everything was as right as it could be. I have been using the same plates right along. And—"

But Jasper Carter was beside himself. He fairly roared at Logan. "Get out! And if you can't come back with what I want, don't come back at all!"

He fairly drove Logan out of the office and slammed the door shut. This door usually stood open on the hall which connected all the other editorial, reportorial and telegraph editors' rooms. But Carter was so enraged at what he considered the cub reporter's stupidity that he did not want to see any one for a while, and so he turned savagely after one or two walks across the room when he heard the door open and Barnes came in.

"Oh, it's you! Well?"

"Look here, Mr. Carter! Call me a fool if you want to! But look here!" He held up a photographic plate still wet. It was clear and without a shadow.

"I waited outside Grey's for him and Maxwell and," Barnes paused curiously, over his hard features an inscrutable glance moved and disappeared, "and the other person, and just as they stepped out, I got a good shot. He was looking squarely at me. And—you can think what you like, but—here is all I got!"

"Let me see!" Carter's hand shot out with a vicious gesture, and in the attempt to pass the plate over to him it slipped out of Barnes's fingers and fell on the floor, breaking up into small pieces. He stooped down and picked up one of the larger fragments and held it up to the light, looking at it as if fascinated.

"This will make the greatest 'story' yet, Mr. Carter. It's great."

"Oh, get out! Do you mean to tell me—" Carter spoke roughly.

"I mean to say I had as fair a shot at him as I ever had at any one, and there is the result."

"You and Cub Logan must have a nice bunch of plates," and Carter in a few words retailed the incident of Logan's failure to secure a negative. Barnes listened gravely and did not reply to Carter's sarcastic advice to overhaul the developer.

He sat thoughtfully eyeing the editor and did not reply to a question until Carter had angrily asked it twice.

"Can't you tell what he looked like?"

"Yes. He looked like an average man—only different."

"How 'different'?"

"I can't describe it exactly. But he was different."

"Well, go on," Carter said impatiently when Barnes stopped, while the same shadow of wonder crossed his face as when he was looking at the photographic plate.

"When he came out of Grey's house with Grey and Mr. Maxwell, I was as near him as I am to you now. He stopped and spoke naturally and pleasantly to all the newspaper men, and answered questions. He is going to preach in Maxwell's church to-morrow. I forgot to say he has a most wonderful voice. I have never heard anything like it anywhere."

"Well," said Carter, "what then?"

"He walked along with Mr. Grey and the Reverend Maxwell and—"

Again that pause, so different from Barnes' usual self-satisfied, jaunty manner, as if his eyes and his thoughts were intent on something far different from the office surroundings.

"Well, what's the matter with you?" Carter's sharp voice broke in.

"As he went up the street toward Mr. Maxwell's house a number of school children came down the walk. We were all following along, and two of the children broke from the group they were with, went right up to—this—person," Barnes uttered the word with strange hesitation, "and each child took a hand—and turned and walked along with him. Mr. Maxwell called them by name and said they belonged to his Sunday school. But they didn't come to him; they came to this Stranger."

"Well—what of it?" said Carter gruffly.

Barnes looked at the editor silently, then answered:

"Nothing."

"Nothing?"

"Yes. That's what I said. Nothing."

"The whole affair is nothing so far. What have we got from all this fuss and mystery? Can you turn out two or three columns for the first edition?"

"I think I can," Barnes replied, but Carter detected a strange note of hesitation.

"What's the matter with you?" he asked angrily.

"I don't know, Mr. Carter. I feel very queer after seeing—him. I don't know how to describe it. You will know better after you have met him."

"Well, maybe I shall. But, look here, Barnes. Of course we will play up the story about this mysterious Stranger who calls himself Jesus as long as it makes good for the Gazette, but don't expect me to be gulled by any fakir or any mysteries beyond clairvoyance or hypnotism or the like. Don't tell me that in this age of the world anything supernatural is possible in Raymond. Oh, no! You can't deceive your Uncle Jasper with any such romance."

"Wait till you see him," Barnes said, still speaking with that unusual backward mental glance over the morning's incidents.

"Well, I will see him. I'll go to church to-morrow. I don't know when I've been," he added with a short laugh. "Guess it won't hurt me."

"You'll have to go early to get in. Word is getting all over town. Everybody is going."

"Can't you get Maxwell to reserve us seats? I hate to go too early and wait."

"I don't think there will be any reserved seats," Barnes answered briefly. "Mr. Maxwell said the doors would be open at eight o'clock."

"Eight o'clock! Do you think I am going at that hour to wait until eleven?"

"You'll have to if you get in." said Barnes, as he went out of the office.

Carter called after him sharply.

"Overhaul your camera and the whole outfit. It's simply nonsense to come off as you did this morning. I have already sent that cub up to Maxwell's to get a picture. He needn't come back unless he gets it!"

"You sent—" Barnes began, and then closed his lips and walked down the hall to the reporters' room.

He clicked off his "story" on the typewriter with characteristic rapidity, but it outran his notes and he had piled up a three-column article before noon. He took it down to the composing-room and then went out.

A large crowd was in front of the Gazette office eagerly reading the bulletin. Several of Barnes's acquaintances excitedly questioned him, but he put them all off, referring them all to the paper which was then running off the press. In less than half an hour the boys were out on the streets crying out the news. It was a significant fact that they had caught the one line at the head of Barnes's "story," and were shouting it carelessly. Barnes had at first written it with a question mark at the end, like this: "Jesus Is Here?" while back in his mind the question represented a sarcasm and a sneer which every one who knew him would understand perfectly well. But as he had pounded out his "story" up there in the reporters' room, as he drew near the end and read over what he had written, he crossed out the question mark and wrote for the heading, "Jesus Is Here!" with an exclamation point after the three words.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

And this was what the boys were calling out on the streets. Before night of that memorable Saturday the words were being uttered in nearly every home of the city. Business men gathered in groups on the corners, discussing the unheard-of event. A crowd surrounded Mr. Maxwell's house, watching every window and door. People called one another up over their telephones and excitedly talked the matter over. The members of Grey's church, who had been present at the meeting Friday night, were eagerly interviewed. The whole town was moved by a thrill of expectation.

In the midst of all the excitement it was curious to note the contradictions and rumors that affirmed and denied. He was of such and such an appearance. He was of no special significance. He had said this. He had not said it. The whole thing was an imposture. It was real. Men like Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Norman, it was said, believed him to be Jesus. And so forth.

That night in Raymond was calm and starlit. Virginia and Rachel were together at Virginia's and during dinner they had been talking as thousands of people all over Raymond were talking about the one great event. Rachel was staying with Virginia while Rollin was in Chicago.

Virginia went over to the west window of the familiar library to draw down a shade, and stopped abruptly. Then she called to Rachel, who was in the sitting-room with her two children, Eloise and Frank. The children had come, with Rachel, to feel that Virginia's home was like their own, and they called her aunt.

"Come, quick, Rachel! Come! The Light!"

Rachel caught up both children and ran in. Setting the boy down on the broad window seat and letting the girl slip to the floor at her feet, she sank into a convenient chair.

Together the two friends watched in silence. The evening star was visible just above the tower of the First Church, which was only four blocks from Virginia's home on the Boulevard. At first Rach ' saw nothing beyond the ordinary beauty of the star. But as she looked, Virginia exclaimed again: "There! There! Don't you see it? There! Just below the star!"

It was entrancing in its unearthly radiance, indescribable in its soft yet penetrating color—that which fell out of the blue vault like palpitating wings, as if the angelic host were singing, an unnumbered company, beating the air with a glory that permeated space and included in its all-enveloping wonder all the planets in addition to earth. Never had light been so diffused, so living. It had a personal charm, as if at any moment a face might appear, smiling but grand, to give body and a name to that which seemed almost to speak. And while they looked and even listened as if a voice might speak, the radiance gently went out, and there hung the star as it had for centuries, now calmly shining over the black roofs of Raymond.

Virginia turned to Rachel. She was trembling and tears were on her face.

"Oh, it is so wonderful! I cannot control myself. How terribly beautiful! Can you comprehend it, Rachel?"

"No. But how can we comprehend what has come to Raymond within the last twenty-four hours? It does not seem possible. Do you realize, Virginia, that to-morrow, in the church where we promised only a few years ago to follow Jesus, we shall actually see him face to face?"

"I cannot believe it. I can hardly wait. Yet I dread it. What if all this should be an imposture! Wh if—"

"But why, Virginia? Why shou it be impossible? Think what it w mean to Raymond and to the worl For, of course, we cannot expect Hi to stay here very long. But I tremb to think what his reception will be i some places."

"But will he not be welcomed by h disciples, Rachel?"

Rachel spoke with deep feeling. "Ol surely he will. The church loves hin Is it not glorious, Virginia, to thin he has chosen to show himself first o all to his church? And how splendi that on the very Sunday when Mr Stanton was to be recognized as Mr Maxwell's assistant Jesus should b with us. Isn't that splendid?"

"Yes," Virginia answered in a lov tone. "It is as it should be."

Silence fell between the two friends as Rachel moved to the window-seat and cuddled the children in her lap After a while she spoke again.

"What do you think of Mr. Stanton, Virginia?"

"He seems—well—different from most men. Not what I had expected."

"What had you expected?"

"I hardly know. More of a ministerial type."

"What is a ministerial type, Virginia?"

Virginia did not answer directly. "He wore a gray suit, a sack coat and a four-in-hand brown silk tie."

"Otherwise," said Rachel teasingly, "he was dressed in perfect taste. Virginia," and her manner changed instantly to a deep seriousness, "did you notice how he—Jesus—was dressed?"

NOTE. II Cor. 4: 16 was accepted as correct because it is stated that the reference is to the "inward man." But Isa. 40: 31, a passage suggested by many readers, could not be accepted because there is nothing in the words themselves to indicate that anything but physical strength is here referred to.

WHY CHRISTIANS ABSTAIN*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

ON THIS "World's Temperance Sunday" it is especially appropriate to note that Paul and other inspired writers, from the days of Moses forward, are not only in advance of the pagan teachers of other lands in their own time in what they commanded and advised and taught as to alcoholism—they are in advance of many, even in this twentieth Christian century. That is one of the most remarkable convictions arising from our four months' tour in nine European countries. Out of six international conferences on world welfare which we attended, usually as delegates, and four national conventions, ten in all, just one-half were "against alcoholism" and for "total abstinence." The growing number of European abstainers, especially among university men, is most encouraging. European doctors, both of medicine and philosophy, are devoting more effort to exposing the harmfulness of even moderate use of the mildest and purest beer and wine than the doctors of the United States. The abstainers of all classes are increasing—100,000 added last year in Germany, where the first abstainer stood alone as the target of universal gibes so recently as 1893. Europe excels us in educational temperance work generally, and in association of pledged men and women of the rank and file in such social centers as the Good Templar lodges and in juvenile organizations for training young abstainers.

But in every large country in Europe abstainers are the exception, not the rule, not only among men but also among women, and even among pastors, though the minority of abstaining ministers (in some few denominations it is the majority) is everywhere increasing.

In Leeds, England, when the employed officials of all British abstinence societies gathered for their annual convention, the preachers present were much fewer than they would have been in a similar convention in the United States, and workers in their reports spoke of difficulties in getting hearings in certain churches, whose pastors frankly said, "You should not expect us to help you much, for you know we are not total abstainers." It should be said that the percentage of abstaining preachers is greater in Britain than in any large European country, and is steadily increasing.

Even those Europeans who are devoted self-sacrificingly to the social betterment of the world and give time and talent and money to the cause of peace, for example, in a great majority of cases have not recognized that alcoholism has prompted more strife than militarism, and calls for such personal sacrifice of appetite as Paul urges not only in the lesson of to-day but in many other passages (I Cor. 10: 23-33).

We will consider not alone the one altruistic reason for abstinence that Paul gives in to-day's lesson, but the threefold argument involved in the two "great commandments" of Moses and Christ, Love God, and your neighbor as yourself, which are really three: (1) Abstain because you love mankind; (2) abstain on the ground of intelligent self-love; (3) abstain because you love God.

Let us now look straight at Paul's appeal to us to abstain for the sake of others. That it has not won more of the church people suggests that it has not been used to its full power as an argument of God through Paul. Many who are altruistic in other ways pay no heed to Paul's words on wine, perhaps because meat and wine are considered together, and both as related to idol sacrifices. They need to be shown that in this ancient case there is an eternal principle, as the kernel in the nut, just as lawyers turn to cases decided in courts far away and long ago to find a law principle that may be as binding as a specific statute. The words of Paul were called out by a bitter controversy in the New Testament churches. The Hebrew Christians claimed that Old Testament rules forbidding the eating of meat or drinking of wine that had been laid on the altar of an idol were binding on all Christians, while those converted from paganism claimed that as an idol was a fraud, the placing of meat and wine on an altar did not hurt it. Paul really agreed with these Gentile Christians, but he told them that as it was a serious matter of conscience with the Hebrew Christians, and would cause strife that might wreck the souls of some of the Hebrew Christians and weaken the usefulness of the church, they should yield. "Destroy not with thy meat him for whom Christ died." It was not necessary they should buy in the markets the idol's meat and the idol's wine. They could get other supplies. It was not a necessity but an indulgence, not a duty but a privilege they were asked to give up for the sake of others—for the sake of the church also, and so for God's sake.

Now let us see exactly how this case applies to-day to wine not offered to idols. The principle has nothing especially to do with "meat" now, for eating meat, whatever vegetarians may say against it, is not now in the same category. Wine and other intoxicating liquors confessedly lead some in every city where they are used to occasional, and some to habitual drunkenness, and some to crime, and many to poverty. No one will deny that of a hundred young men in any town or city who are in any way led to begin the habit of using intoxicating drinks, some will be wrecked morally; nor will any one deny that the example of employers, teachers, deacons, pastors, will influence some of these young men to begin the habit.

The issue, then, that is put up to every man disposed to drink, even if he is so behind the times that he thinks that no material harm will come to himself from moderate drinking, and that he can always hold in check an appetite that has ruined many greater men—the issue, even for such a man, is squarely this: Shall I for the sake of this one form of indulgence, which is not in any sense a necessity of life, which is not a duty, even though I may think it my privilege—shall I for this personal pleasure set an example that will almost inevitably lead some others to the same indulgence, with the probability that some of them, if not myself, will suffer dire consequences in drunkenness or crime or poverty, and so will bring dire consequences upon others, to the dishonor of God and the injury of the community?

There are many who talk big of altruism and social service and welfare work and world uplift who are unwilling to give up their wineglass as their contribution to the elimination of the drink habit and the drink traffic. Over and over again let us challenge men with Neal Dow's translation of Paul: "No one has a moral right to do that which, if the whole world follows his example, as some are sure to do, will produce more harm than good." Dr. Campbell Morgan contrasts those who are self-centered with those who are love-centered—the latter "self-denying, intelligent and always merciful." Surely, the man who is intelligently love-centered will have no part in promoting the chief curse of mankind.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

A lurid light is thrown on Paul's exhortation to abstain for the sake of others by modern studies in heredity, which show that we should abstain not alone because our example may bring harm to a neighbor, but because a drinking father and, yet more, a drinking mother endangers the health, the morals, the very lives of their children.

Abstinence for the sake of others should have a meaning as broad as the missionary appeal, for no nation liveth to itself. In Scandinavia, which promises to be first to secure prohibition in Europe, the unfaithfulness of certain law enforcement offices in American prohibition States and of citizens furnishes the strongest weapon of the defenders of the drink traffic. On the other hand, the beneficial effects of enforced prohibition in Kansas and North Dakota and North Carolina and Oklahoma and Mississippi, and recently in Maine, are the best reinforcements of all who, in other lands, seek to banish the bar room. Both for abstinence and prohibition we may well raise the words of John Stuart Mill as our banner: "My liberty ends when it begins to involve the possibility of ruin to my neighbor."

Undoubtedly there are very many, even in the churches, who rarely climb the heights of pure altruism. God himself recognizes that altruism and egoism, humanitarianism and intelligent self-love should be harnessed as a spur to carry men forward into right living. We shall "follow God" when we show that the man who loves his neighbor and himself intelligently abstains from all participation in the drink evil.

Learned men have shown by many experiments that in everything that concerns self, alcohol is a handicap. When even a little has been taken, the eyes cannot see a signal or a foe's fist as quickly, nor send a shot as straight to the target; nor can the ear hear as clearly; nor the brain remember as well or decide a problem as rapidly; nor can the hand set as much type, nor the feet run as well in a race; nor can the interior organs, the heart, the lungs, the liver, the kidneys, do their vital tasks as well.

When a boy is of a distinguished family, unless he is a base pervert, he is more careful than boys of no reputation to do nothing that will dishonor the family name. If at all worthy, he seeks rather to add to its honors. The very greatest reason why we should do no wrong is that each of us by creation is "the child of a King, and if Christians we have also deliberately vowed to be true to the great name of Christ. Will any Christian in this twentieth century deny that the natural effect of intoxicating drinks is to dull the higher, controlling faculties of judgment and conscience? Alcohol in its ultimate effect is stupefying, and long short of the helpless state man's powers are dulled. Alcohol is not a stimulant, science tells us to-day, but a narcotic, that is, something that puts the user into a state of narcosis, of half sleep. God gives us brains to use at their best, and we have no brains to spare for alcohol to feed upon. Insurance tables of fifty years in Great Britain, as we have often shown, prove that even moderate drinking is a slow poison that kills thirteen years in thirty-one years. Our years are a sacred trust from God to use for him and for mankind and for our own best development. We are stealing trust funds when we cut our lives short.

It is most essential that it should be made known in homes, schools, churches, in the press, and by door-to-door circulation of literature that the old idea that about the only evil result to be feared from the use of intoxicants is drunkenness, is fully exploded by modern experiments showing that it is "alcoholism" we should fear most of all, "the chronic poisoning which comes from the habitual use of wine, beer or spirits, even to an extent that would not produce drunkenness." In central Europe, where people mostly drink wine and beer and drink it slowly at tables, travelers note that drunkenness is not as common as where distilled liquors are more used and are swallowed quickly at a bar, as in Scandinavia and Great Britain, so there are many who jump to the conclusion that the milder drinks taken slowly do little harm. Movements for abstinence and prohibition in Europe are therefore many of them repeating the efforts made in vain in the United States almost a century ago to stop the sale and use of distilled liquors only, leaving beer and wine almost unopposed in the realm of habit and traffic alike. Against this fallacy should be marshaled the great recent condemnations of moderate drinking by Emperor William and Continental university professors, and by President Eliot and American scholars. Science has disproved the old theories that liquors strengthen workmen's hands and quicken scholars' minos, and nothing is left but the claim that they add to the joys of life. It is time that this lie of the "mocker" was driven from the field. Liquors have added far more sorrow than joy, and the joy itself has been only a counterfeit, usually followed by depression. Intelligent selfishness points straight to the abstinent life.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—A REQUEST FOR more information as to the Loyal Temperance Legion, previously mentioned in the Round Table, comes to us just in time for us to put the reply, appropriately, with the lesson for World's Temperance Sunday, showing "plan of organization and mode of conducting." The writer has often said that the Loyal Temperance Legion is equal to the very best of young people's societies, for it combines with religious devotion and good fellowship a regular study of the moral and civic problems of good citizenship on a broad scale. It follows Pentecost with a book of acts. It includes in its practical applications of Christianity not one virtue only, but all the virtues, and considers not alone their relation to the individual but also to the social order. Its conventions show no less enthusiasm than other conventions of young people, but more knowledge than most of them of personal and social ethics. It is greatly to be regretted that there are so few Loyal Temperance Legions or other organizations of young people corresponding to British Bands of Hope in which four millions of youth are being trained in the practice and promotion of good morals. If the youth of the United States were organized in like proportion we should have eight millions. We haven't even one million boys and girls enrolled in such organizations devoted to temperance and morality and meeting frequently to strengthen each other and promote the cause. Every Sunday school should have such a "legion of honor"—indeed, the whole school should be pledged and enrolled and have full charge of the quarterly temperance Sunday exercises as their quarterly public meeting. The constitution and full particulars may be had by applying with stamp to N. W. C. T. U., Evanston, Ill.

—THE BOY SCOUTS provide for much the same influences so far as boys are concerned, and information as to forming "patrols" such as should be found in connection with every Sunday school can be secured from the Y. M. C. A. International Committee, 124 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York, which is endeavoring to keep down the military idea, and make the scouts more like foresters and explorers and soldiers. The Boy Scouts are always abstainers from tobacco and intoxicating liquors, but are not devoted to one virtue—rather to a rounded character and general helpfulness. Their motto is "Do a good turn to somebody every day."

—QUESTIONS AND SUGGESTIONS for the Round Table should be sent to Rev. W. F. Crafts, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C. We would like to get at once some brief reports of ways for children to celebrate Christmas unselfishly—not by plans that keep them thinking night and day for a month what they will get, but rather will make them think eagerly of giving to others as Jesus gave himself to us.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Home Life*

WE BECOME so used to thinking of the delights and opportunities of the life of Christian homes that we sometimes fail to realize what it would have meant to us to have been brought up in another kind of a home. A bishop said to Monica, the mother of St. Augustine, when she was grieving over the waywardness of her son: "The son of so many prayers cannot be lost." There are many of us in church life and church work to-day who have much the same sort of conviction. It seems to us that the prayers and the examples of our godly parents and the beautiful atmosphere of the Christian home have made it impossible for us to wander away from the faith or to remain away when we have wandered.

Paul, in writing to his youthful helper Timothy, speaks of "the unfeigned faith" which was in him, which, as he expressed it, "dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois and thy mother Eunice, and I am persuaded in thee also." Here was a splendid heritage of Christian faith even when the church was only a few decades old. Who this elderly lady Lois was we do not know, but in all probability she was among those favored women who had heard the voice of Jesus and had looked into his eyes. Her soul had been quickened to faith in him; her daughter had inherited the same faith, and young Timothy had been brought up in the atmosphere and under the power of it. The reference from the Gospel of John, chapter 11, verses 1 to 5, gives us the picture of another home where Christ was welcomed and loved. He was often glad to walk over the hills to Bethany and rest there with his friends.

Many changes have come over the home life and the child life of America since the days of the Pilgrims. Religion is less stern a thing than it was then. Children have liberties that were undreamed of, but the presence of Christ in the home will still hold them to the faith as in the past. Some of the old customs, however, should be guarded with the most jealous care. It is one of the saddest and most perilous facts of American life that so many Christian homes are now without family prayer. Nothing better could happen for the church and for the nation than that on this day when the young people of two great organizations are studying the question of Christian Home Life, the neglected habit of family prayer should be re-established in a thousand homes. This may be a time when the children can do something for the parents. This is a young people's meeting, so it is to the young people that the message comes at this particular time. If, under the pressure of these strenuous twentieth century days, your parents have ceased the old custom of family worship, will you not ask them to begin it again? There is probably no other single thing you could do which would mean so much to the life of the church and the community as this. If we are to continue to bring up Christians who are strong in the faith and leaders in the kingdom of God, we must keep our homes places of prayer.

They must not only be places of prayer, but places, also, of love. Many big and little matters of home life test our patience; many a doubting or wayward member of Christian homes has been hindered from accepting Christ by the impatience and harshness of those who profess to love him. We must let Christ keep us sweet and kind and patient every hour so that the atmosphere of home shall be the atmosphere of love.

* "CHRISTIAN HOME LIFE." Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic for November 9, 1913. II Tim. 1: 1-5. (A meeting in some member's home, if convenient, led by the social committee.) B. Y. P. U. adds John 11: 1-5.

Little Brothers and Sisters*

IT IS rather trying business, being a little brother or little sister. There are so many things big brothers and sisters can do, so many things going on that one is crowded out of, so many nights when one must go to bed right in the midst of the delights of the evening, or even before they have well begun, that altogether the lot of a younger brother or sister is far from enviable.

If your family is a large one, it may be that you can remember some of these experiences. If you can, try to think of them often, now that you yourself are a big brother or a big sister. When the home questions come up that relate to the little folks now, it is so easy to forget the experiences of the past and to lose sympathy with those who are going through difficulties we were meeting not long ago.

Again our New Testament gives us the answer to this problem, which may seem at first thought not to be one of first importance, as it gives us the answer to every other problem of life. The word, as of course you know, is love. If you really love these little brothers and sisters you will find countless ways of making them happy and countless ways of saving them from chagrin and grief.

The Scripture references are peculiarly interesting. Two of them are taken from the story of Joseph. The first, Gen. 42: 22, contains the words of Reuben, which he spoke when his brothers were planning to sell Joseph to the Ishmaelites long before, "Do not sin against the child." Gen. 44: 30-34 contain the beautiful words by which Judah expressed the great love that Jacob had for Benjamin, his youngest boy: "His life is bound up in the lad's life." When Joseph, the ruler, pretended to wish to keep Benjamin for a slave because his cup had been found in the boy's sack, Judah, his older brother, pleaded: "Let thy servant abide instead of the lad, a bondman to my lord." He had previously said to Jacob when urging him to let Benjamin go down to Egypt: "I will be surety for him." He was now making good his pledge, willing to become a slave that his little brother might go back to their father, free."

Judah said another beautiful thing in pleading with Joseph: "How shall I go up to my father, and the lad be not with me?" There are very grave responsibilities, after all, in our relationship with these little brothers and sisters. They will be influenced by what we do. We may lead them to the Master and take them to heaven with us, or by our careless example or our unkindness we may drive them away.

John 21: 15 contains the beautiful words of Jesus: "Feed my lambs." He gave this task to Peter as a test of his love. We cannot truthfully say we love the Master unless we are caring for them. In Matt. 18: 5, 6 Jesus declares positively that what we do for his little ones is counted as a kindness toward himself. And he gives in terrible language his judgment upon any one who would offend, or harm, a little child.

The Big Brother movement has done much to save boys who had begun to go wrong. Young men of influence and standing have undertaken to look after certain boys, and become really their big brothers. There is a movement of this same sort among young women for looking after younger girls. Whether or not you have little brothers and sisters in your own homes you can find some little people whose lives you can cheer and whose souls you may win for the Master.

* "WHAT CAN WE DO FOR OUR LITTLE BROTHERS AND SISTERS?" Epworth League Topic for Sunday, November 9, 1913. Gen. 42: 22; John 21: 15; Matt. 18: 5, 6; Gen. 44: 30-34.

A pretty woolen, but will it keep clean?

PROBABLY it will soil easily but, even though it be pure wool, you should have no trouble to keep it like new if you wash the garment carefully with Ivory Soap.

It is the rubbing of woolens on the washboard, the rubbing of soap on the material, the soaking in extremely hot and cold waters and the use of ordinary laundry soap full of "free" alkali that cause shrinking and give the material that washed-out appearance.

Set the color if necessary. Have the water neither too hot nor too cold. Have all the rinse waters of the same temperature as the suds. Wash by drawing garment through the hands and working up and down. Wring loosely. Hang in warm place but not where garment will steam. Iron while still damp, wrong side up, with a warm—not hot—iron. Make the suds with Ivory Soap Paste. Follow these hints and you should have no trouble whatever.

The Ivory Soap Paste (see directions inside wrapper★) offers a quick, effective, economical way of making suds with Ivory Soap. But the important thing is, that Ivory Soap itself, having no "free" alkali and being perfectly mild and pure, cannot spoil the effect of the safe, careful handling suggested above.

IVORY SOAP . . . . . 99 44/100 % PURE

THE SEVEN CHURCHES OF ASIA

PHILADELPHIA, THE CITY OF THE OPEN DOOR

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

THE pilgrimage to the Seven Cities brought us to Philadelphia from the great table lands that cover a large part of the interior of Asia Minor and which lie for the most part to the north and east of the Seven Cities. Very early on a crisp March morning we had left Ushak and its unspeakable hotel for a railway journey that takes one over as wild and picturesque a region as he is likely to find in the five continents. Ushak itself is by no means uninteresting; the minarets of the mosques are tipped with metal, and as we left the little city they glittered in the light of the sun's earliest rays. Barley, wheat and opium grow in the rich, red earth of this district, and it is especially famous as the headquarters of the manufacture of the heavy carpets which we call Turkish rugs. These are largely made in private houses, and some thousands of women and girls are employed as weavers, while the men wash and dye the wool. Since carpet weaving is the chief mechanical industry of this region, and is a recognized business of at least three of the Seven Cities—Smyrna, Thyatira and Philadelphia—it may interest my readers to know how these carpets are made. Imagine a large, bare room; in front of us is a great frame, perhaps twenty feet in width; in front of the frame are seated half a dozen women and girls whose deft fingers fly like lightning as they break off two or three inches of wool from bunches of different colors that hang over their heads. With incredible activity they knot this little piece of yarn to one of the threads of the web, choosing with marvelous exactness the right shade to match the pattern that is before them. So rapidly do their fingers move that one can scarcely follow them as, with all the skill and exact precision of a practiced piano-player, they break off and tie the little piece of yarn, reach for another of a different color, break it off and knot it, keeping up this exacting task for hours at a time, until one aches in sympathy with the tired hands that are flying in and out in front of the great frame. After a little of the wool has been knotted to the web it is combed out and cut even with large shears, and then pounded down with a peculiar shaped hammer; and yet the most that a skilful woman can weave in a long day's work is only about ten inches of a carpet two feet wide. The most important of the coloring matter used is obtained from the madder root which grows abundantly in all this region as well as about Thyatira, and is doubtless the color with which Lydia dyed her so-called "purple." Of late years the aniline dyes have largely supplanted the old Turkey red produced from the madder root, the indigo which came from India, and the cochineal from the Indies, greatly to the deterioration of the carpets and the loss of the carpet-buying public.

A SARCOPHAGUS MADE INTO A FOUNTAIN AT PHILADELPHIA

But we are on our way to Philadelphia and cannot linger longer among the carpet looms of Ushak. Soon after leaving that little city our road begins to wind down hill, for Ushak is 3,000 feet and more above the sea, while Ala Shehr, as the ancient Philadelphia is now called, is only a few hundred feet above the sea. During the last part of the journey to Philadelphia the descent is very rapid, and the scenery grows every moment more wild and rugged. Through tunnel after tunnel the train shoots, while far down below we can see a great plain covered with curious columns and mounds of soft rock, which have been sculptured by the storms of many winters into all sorts of curious shapes. At last the foot of the hills is reached and we come to the valley of the Cogamus, a tributary of the greater Hermus. After the magnificent views which the valley of the Hermus affords and of the magnificent Boz Dagh, the Cogamus Valley seems rather tame, but Philadelphia itself is relieved by some fine mountains of the Tmolus range which form a splendid background for the ancient city. A walk of half a mile or three-quarters from the railway station brings us into the heart of the modern city of Ala Shehr, which, though by no means remarkable for cleanliness, is yet one of the most attractive and well-kept of the Turkish cities of the interior. As we approach the city we see a rapid stream of considerable width, tumbling riotously through the main street, over the sharp cobblestones, and spanned every now and then by a board a foot wide for the benefit of pedestrians. This water comes from the hills and is on its way to the vineyards on the other side of the city. When one series of vineyards has been irrigated, the water is turned into another street and, flowing in another direction, irrigates other acres of vines, for Ala Shehr is famous to-day, as was Philadelphia in the olden time, for its grapes and its wine which Strabo eulogized 2,000 years ago. Ancient volcanoes are not far away to the east and the north, and, as we shall see later, Philadelphia has suffered terribly from earthquakes, due perhaps to the proximity of these volcanoes. But some compensation has been afforded in the volcanic soil, which has clothed the fertile valley with the vine, the almond, and the peach. It was winter when we left the table lands about Ushak in the early morning; it was late in the spring when we reached Ala Shehr a few hours later; the almond trees flourished and the cherries and peaches were great bouquets of pink and white bloom. There is little of special interest to the modern traveler in the Philadelphia of to-day, except as everything reminds him of the city of the Revelator. In Sardis and Pergamos the patient pick and spade of the excavator have laid bare the ancient glories of these once magnificent cities. But in Philadelphia scarcely a sod has been turned by the archeologist. Sometimes, where a cellar has been dug for some modern house, a few treasures of ancient times have been laid bare. Yet the everyday life of these modern cities of the Orient is always of interest to the traveler. Toward sunset great herds of ugly, black water-buffaloes stumble bellowing through the streets, driven perhaps by a small boy perched on a donkey's back. The public bakeries are found in almost every street, and,

A HINDU MISSION IN CALIFORNIA

BY MARY E. BAMFORD

"SIX thousand seven hundred." So the young Hindu on the porch of the Administration Building at Angel Island estimated the number of Hindus in California at that time. He himself was a graduate of the University of California, was studying for his master's degree, and was acting meantime as United States interpreter.

We American women, visiting the station, stood in a semi-circle about him while he told us that he had traveled in the San Joaquin Valley and had found the farmers suited with the Hindus as laborers. He himself, it seemed, was the son of a professor in a government university at Calcutta, and belonged to "the second caste," he said—the soldier caste, Kshatriyas.

"But I don't believe in caste," he immediately added.

Hindus! What pictures of them memory recalls! A train rushes down the Sacramento Valley and a gang of Hindu track laborers stands aside to let us pass. Or, journeying down the east side of the Sacramento River, one catches sight of several turbaned Hindus standing about the doorway of a station. Or suddenly a Broadway street corner in Oakland, prosaic enough usually, is seen to have blossomed in color, for there stands a little knot of five Hindu men, their turbans of yellow and white topping their heads like chrysanthemums that have sprung up in a moment.

Sikhs from the Punjab are most of the California Hindus, black-bearded, for, according to their religion, they may not shave. Aryans are these people like ourselves. Look at their faces, ignoring their dark skin with its underlying shade of deep olive, and you will see that the shape of the nose is American, if there can be said to be an American nose.

But not every Hindu who appears in California is a Sikh. There is the Bengali. One day I had taken a large company of ladies on a pass I had obtained for them to visit Angel Island Immigration Station. We were being shown over the Chinese Detention Building, when, in another room in the second story, I spied two Hindus. I hurried to them, for I had some Gospels in the queer curved characters of the Punjabi. "Salaam," I said, to which one Hindu loudly responded, "Salaam."

"Sikh?" I questioned.

Yes, they were Sikhs, and I gave them a Punjabi Gospel apiece.

Then a third black-bearded Hindu came from another room, and, unwitting of offense, I greeted him with "Salaam."

"Why do you say 'Salaam' to me?" he burst out, asserting that he talked American.

He did not talk it very well, however. One had to listen closely to understand the language he poured forth. He was not a Sikh, but a Bengali. Some of my party had come in, and among them was a woman, who had been for many years in Rangoon, Burma. She then took a hand in the conversation, asking the other two Hindus if they were Sikhs, and telling them she would have known it by the divided folds of their turbans.

Many of the Hindu immigrants are very poor, but there are occasional exceptions. It is said that five Hindus once came to Angel Island with $1,500 each, and one Hindu, who was worth $50,000, did not disdain to work in a ditch so that he might practically learn American methods.

The Hindu must, of course, bring his own ideas of funeral ceremonies to America. Some time ago it was announced that some Hindus had attempted to float the dead body of one of their countrymen down the Sacramento River. But I have little apprehension that the Sacramento will ever become a second Ganges. Americans are too "finicky" about sanitation for the ideas of India to prevail in the Sacramento Valley to any great extent.

SAN FRANCISCO'S HINDU TEMPLE

San Francisco has its Hindu temple, a strange looking building, with queer ornaments and swelling protuberances on its roof. A gallery, ornamented with plants, runs around the upper part of the building, which is of wood painted cream-color. The general aspect of the building is Moorish.

I went to the front door one day and a Swami answered my ring. His dark skin had that distinct purple undertinge of the Hindu. He gave me a pamphlet and a list of lectures, and I showed h a copy of St. John in Punjabi, saying that he might have seen it. He looked at it a moment, and handed it back to me, saying, "It is one of the dialects of India. It is not Sanskrit."

Far be it from me to have thought it was Sanskrit, but I took my Hindu temple pamphlet and retired. The list of lectures that he had given me said something significant: "All our members or students are American citizens."

After one passes around to the side of the Hindu temple, one comes to an entrance and pauses to read the right-hand board, as follows:

"This is the First Vedanta or Hindu Mission in the West. Erected 21st August, 1905. The Vedanta is the Oldest Literature Existent, consisting of the Highest, Sublimest Thoughts in the World. Represented and illustrated here by the Ramakrishna Mission, Belur-Matti, Calcutta, India, founded by the Swami Vivekananda. Swami Trigunatita, Lecturer and Teacher. Free interviews given at Office. Appointments made at Sunday lectures in this Auditorium. Please see other Board. Office, 2963 Webster Street, same building."

All members of this Hindu temple are Americans. They have a retreat in San Antone Valley to which they go yearly to spend thirty days in meditation and prayer. The little leaflet for Mar. issued by the temple, mentions among the privileges of members or students "admittance into the Shanti Ashrama (Peace Retreat) for practical Yogi. Exercises (one month a year) in daily life, if certified under direct guidance."

But certain Hindus are not altogether forgetful of their fellow countrymen, religiously. In May, 1912, articles of incorporation were filed in Berkeley, Calif., for the Pacific Coast Khalss Diwan Society "for promulgation of the faith of Guru Nanak and Guru Gobind Singh. The organization was intended "to care for the spiritual welfare and the moral and educational uplift of all Hindu Sikhs and other Hindustani students on the Pacific coast." It was announced that a house of worship would be bought and regular services held, the seventeen trustees all giving the family name of Singh. The American Bible Society endeavors to reach the Hindus through the distribution of Gospels which the society issues in Punjabi, Bengali, Hindu and Urdu. A missionary of the society once held a service for Hindu workmen in their temporary car homes in Berkeley where thirty-five Hindus labored on the railroad. Among them was a Mohammedan who could read and speak English well, having been seven years in college in India. This Mohammedan, strange to say, seemed much pleased to read the Ten Commandments, the Sermon on the Mount, and the Lord's Prayer in English, and interpret for the missionary when he explained the meaning to the Hindus.

THE SEVEN CHURCHES OF ASIA

making their way toward these bakeries, one often sees a line of women with long wooden trays filled with unbaked loaves which will be thrust far into the capacious mouth of the public oven. The Greek women can be distinguished from the Turkish by their unveiled faces, but you will see no Jews in Ala Shehr, because its market day, when almost all the trading is done, comes on Saturday, and it would be a profanation for a devout Jew to buy or sell or get gain on the Sabbath day. Possibly the shrewd Greeks, who number about 5,000 out of the 20,000 men, women and children of modern Philadelphia, have decreed that the Jewish Sabbath shall be their market-day for the express purpose of excluding them from their city.

SOME OF THE FEW ANTIQUITIES FOUND AT PHILADELPHIA

One of the most interesting and beneficent natural products of Ala Shehr is a splendid spring of mineral water, famous from the time of the apostles. The spring rises a mile from the city, and is brought in pipes to a modest hydropathic establishment near the town, where the water is bottled in large quantities and sent all over western Asia Minor. It is a refreshing tonic-water, and is an untold boon to travelers in that land, since it can be had in almost every town of any size, where the ordinary water is filled with all sorts of dangerous microbes and is undrinkable by one not accustomed to it from youth.

Though almost no excavation work has been done in Philadelphia there are many indications that it would be most rewarding could any one be found with time and money to unearth the buried treasures. In digging the foundation for a Greek school an ancient Greek cemetery was discovered with many beautiful stili, funeral urns and mourning figures. These are preserved in one of the rooms of the school, which appeared to be an admirable institution for so remote a town. We were told that in a vineyard near the workmen who were setting the vines had recently fallen through the earth into some large underground chambers. Going out to the vineyard we found that the rumor was true, and there, a few feet under the surface, were arches of brick and stone and chambers with mural decorations still fresh, though the painters have been dead perhaps for 2,000 years. Wreaths of painted flowers, tied with ribbons, seemed to be the chief decoration for these chambers, which possibly were sepulchers of the olden time, though so far as I know no one has yet certainly discovered their use.

The ruins of Philadelphia are few and uninteresting, and I was not able to discover the great solitary pillar which some modern commentators declare is to be found there, reminiscent of the "pillar" of Philadelphia's message in Revelation. The most interesting Greek church which we visited contained a picture of the Revelator's vision painted by an artist whose name and fame have been forgotten in the long passage of the centuries. It represents our Lord in the midst of the "seven golden candlesticks" clothed with a long garment and girdled with gold. In his right hand were the seven stars

MRS. PANKHURST, MILITANT

FOR the first few days after Mrs Emmeline Pankhurst landed in New York she kept the public in general very busy trying to reconcile her past stormy record with herself and her present cautious procedure. Though the suffrage leaders in New York had calculated that Mrs. Pankhurst's appearance on the lecture platform in America would draw unprecedented crowds, her first lecture in New York was not largely attended and could not be termed an unqualified success even by the most enthusiastic of her supporters.

One of the evening newspapers which is most apt to report favorably anything connected with woman suffrage opened its account of the evening as follows: "Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst's début here as a lecturer for the 'cause' was in keeping with the weather, decidedly chilly, only three thousand persons attending the meeting last night at Madison Square Garden." Mrs. Pankhurst's failure to fill Madison Square Garden, as had been anticipated, was all the more surprising as the lecture immediately followed several days of unrivaled newspaper publicity. The Immigration Department raised objections to the militant leader's entrance to the United States, and the newspapers followed every move in the proceedings with great attention.

Mrs. Pankhurst arrived on the French liner Provence on Saturday, October 18. Instead of being allowed to land, she was interviewed on board the steamer by representatives of the Immigration Department, and after a short inquiry was informed that she would have to go to Ellis Island until her case was settled. Almost immediately after her arrival at the immigration station, Mrs. Pankhurst appeared before a board of special inquiry. There her record of militancy in England was fully aired. Her responses to the questions as to her mission in America were very guarded. For example, on being asked "Is it your purpose in this country to advocate the tactics that you have in England—violence and destruction of property—in order to accomplish your purpose?" Mrs. Pankhurst replied: "I do not come to interfere with the business of American women."

"Is it your purpose to advise them to accomplish their aims, if necessary, by the destruction of life or property?" asked a member of the board.

The reply to this was evasive. "I have never advised the destruction of life."

The final decision of the board was that Mrs. Pankhurst would not be allowed to enter the United States. An appeal from this decision was immediately made to Washington, and President Wilson was induced to give the matter his personal consideration. After consultation with William B. Wilson, secretary of labor, and Anthony Caminetti, commissioner general of immigration, the decision was reached that the militant should be permitted to fulfil her lecture tour contract on her assurance that she would leave immediately upon its conclusion. Shortly after noon on Monday Mrs. Pankhurst was allowed to land.

The newspapers have done their utmost to show all the varied aspects of Mrs. Pankhurst's peculiar character. Upon learning that there was some doubt as to whether she would be finally admitted, she announced: "If the decision to deport me back to France is upheld, I will go to any extreme to secure my entrance to the United States." In her comments on the suffrage situation in England, there has been no doubt as to her militancy. She declared it her purpose in America to tell the complete story of the "suffrage revolution in England." One of her statements implied her conviction that the women of England were at open war against the government. When asked what type of war it was that moved in the dark and accomplished its work by violence against which there could be no active retaliation, she refused to answer the question. Mrs. Pankhurst, in many instances, narrowed her statements and arguments almost entirely to a consideration of personalities. "I wish," she said, "that it could be understood that our movement in England is directed against 'King' Asquith and not against King George. There is just one obstinate old man now in England who bars the way from women getting the vote. It is Asquith who is blocking suffrage there." Further in the same conversation she reannounced the watchword of the militants, saying: "Our motto is 'Give us the vote or give us death.'"

MRS. PANKHURST GREETED BY JOAN WICKHAM AT THE PIER

While the militant leader was detained at Ellis Island, the New York Evening Mail sent a lady, one of its special writers, down for an interview. This was denied her, but the reporter stayed and had a good look at Mrs. Pankhurst, came back on the ferry boat with her to New York, and wrote for the paper that evening her impressions of this strange Englishwoman. Here are some of her bits of description, written to amuse the homegoing evening crowd:

"Imagine your Aunt Cynthia—the gentle, kind little aunt who had rosy cheeks from living in the country and was always your favorite because she slipped you cookies and kissed your forehead when you bumped it, and had lovely blue eyes and nice teeth, and a voice never raised in upbraidings—and you have a fair mental picture of Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, of international fame as a militant suffrage leader, inciter to riot, spreader of arson, hurler of bombs, the woman terrorist of Great Britain!

"Until I saw Mrs. Pankhurst she figured in my mind as a defiant, catty little lady with a chip on one shoulder and a hatchet in her belt, somewhat old and wrinkled. . . . Mrs. Pankhurst appeared. And if she wasn't little, sweet, gentle, kind Aunt Cynthia to the life, may I never type another line or tell another story! Nobody was with her but Mrs. Dorr and the matron, so I tagged along. Aunt Cynthia was struggling under a load of luggage. She had a bouquet of pink roses and a bunch of violets and lilies of the valley. In one hand she gripped a suitcase apparently loaded with cast iron; in the other a brown paper parcel and a baby-size suitcase. . . . 'Thank you so much,' the militant leader smiled, handing over the cast-iron suitcase, 'it's the heaviest of the lot.' And you felt just like the boy who dreamed of a terrible tempest and awoke to find the family kitten purring in his ear. . . . Mrs. Pankhurst is by no means old; undoubtedly on the sunny side of sixty. Her eyes are blue and beautiful, full of expression, bright with animation, soft with kindness. She has a ruddy-apple complexion, a winning smile and a voice so gentle that it is a wonder it carries over a big hall. She has marked personal magnetism and peculiar charm. From her grayish hair to her nice, neat feet, she looks about as militant as an Easter rabbit and as dangerous as an olive branch. To think of her committing or inciting violence, preaching red fire and leading a mob is a difficult feat of the imaginaton, once you have seen and talked to her." Such were the impressions made upon a capable and normal young writer by the woman who has led in the destruction of all preconceived ideals of conduct for women.

MEXICO STILL MAKING TROUBLE

DURING the weeks leading up to the presidential election in Mexico that country succeeded in still more closely engaging the attention of the Foreign Offices of the governments of the world. Upon General Huerta's announcement that he had assumed the dictatorship of his country the United States Government announced that under such circumstances it could not recognize the results of an election as a free choice of the people. After-events indicate that Washington's attitude is fully justified, as the presidential campaign amounted to practically nothing. General Huerta refused nomination, but allowed the candidates to conduct their campaigns only through the distribution of literature. There were no parades or mass meetings.

It was a great cause of wonderment as to why the name of General Felix Diaz was entirely omitted both from the editorial and news pages of the government organs. This mystery was cleared up upon the general's attempt to return to his native land. Having had his proposed trip to Japan canceled, and having been sent on an unimportant mission to Europe, General Diaz was returning to Mexico via Havana, Cuba. On the morning of October 22 he went ashore at Vera Cruz from the steamship Corcovado. It was rumored that his immediate return to Havana had been ordered by General Huerta, but no definite action was taken to put this drastic order into effect. One of the despatches announces that General Diaz is apparently entirely without a following, and could only be elected to the presidency through some unforseen turn of circumstances.

The most serious aspect of the Mexican situation is that it has become the cause of unpleasant and strained relations between the State Department in Washington and the British Foreign Office. The American Government is irrevocably committed to its policy of non-recognition of the Huerta Government, and there have been persistent rumors that the belligerency of the rebels in Mexico might receive recognition. Great Britain recognized Huerta as provisional president of Mexico, and from the most recent despatches, it would seem, is not averse to giving him permanent recognition on the ground that though he is undesirable as the head of Mexico's government, he is the strongest man in his country at the present time and the only one likely to bring any semblance or order out of the present chaos. The London papers state the British attitude as a belief that Mexico's troubles are domestic, and, as such, must be settled within her own borders, leaving the rest of the world no alternative but to grant recognition and continue business with whoever happens to come out the winner.

MR. NELSON O'SHAUGHNESSY

United States Chargé d'Affaires Representing Our Government in Mexico City

The conditions in Mexico City are believed to be very serious. Business is admittedly at a standstill, and there is considerable fear that the rebels may gain possession of the city. On October 15 the resident diplomats informed President Huerta that their governments desired the maintenance in the capital of a garrison of at least five thousand men to protect foreign lives and property. The report has been persistent that ten nations, including England, France, Spain, Norway, Cuba, Guatemala, and probably China, had taken steps to induce their governments to send warships for the protection of foreign interests. Germany has already taken decisive steps in this direction. The steamer upon which General Felix Diaz crossed from Europe was of German registry, and was provided by the German Government with a guard in the shape of the protected cruiser Hertha, which is now in the harbor at Vera Cruz, and which, it was announced, would be joined within a few days by a sister ship.

The exchange of governmental opinions between the Mexican foreign minister and Mr. Nelson O'Shaughnessy, the United States chargé d'affaires, have been attended by many unpleasant features during the last few weeks. The Mexican foreign office claims that every communication from Washington has referred to General Huerta and the members of his cabinet in very uncomplimentary terms. Several of the replies have contained retaliatory insinuations, which finally caused the United States Government to direct Mr. O'Shaughnessy to inform General Huerta that his communications would be accepted only when couched in diplomatic terms.

THE RIGHT OF PRIVATE JUDGMENT

*A SERMON BY PASTOR D. H. STEFFENS

TEXT: "Ye shall know them by their fruits." Matt. 7: 16

PERHAPS the most hateful thing about Protestantism in the eyes of Rome is its insistence upon what is commonly called the "right of private judgment." In his Faith of Our Fathers, His Eminence, James, Cardinal Gibbons devotes five whole chapters to his argument against this principle. Rome is willing to forgive us anything but that. The most heinous offense, the most damnable sacrilege of Protestantism is its persistent refusal to humbly recognize the infallible authority of the supreme pontiff, and its insistence upon the right and duty of every individual Christian to know and beware of false prophets.

It is, therefore, of greatest importance that the words of our text were by the Lord of the church addressed, not to the chosen twelve, but to all who heard his Sermon on the Mount. They are thus a recognition of the supreme dignity and sacred responsibility of the individual, whose eternal destiny depends upon his own personal attitude toward the truth. When Christ says: "Ye shall know them by their fruits," he puts the judgment of their prophets into the hands of the people who hear their preaching. He confers upon them the "right of private judgment."

To urge that a congregation of Christian believers or an individual Christian must give up this sacred right and, without question, humbly accept whatever some minister may choose to preach; blindly follow wherever some minister may choose to lead, and unhesitatingly obey whatever some minister may choose to command, is to urge a principle as pernicious as it is false.

I say "false," because our Lord, when he urges his Christians to "beware of false prophets" and to "know them by their fruits," distinguishing the true from the false or untrue, beyond all question raises his people up to the throne of judgment, places the scales of truth in their hands and requires them to exercise their God-given "right of private judgment." I say "pernicious," because as "the just shall live by his faith," so, in things pertaining to our salvation, we may not, we dare not place any dependence upon mere human power or authority. Can any man die for me? Can any man be my advocate with God? Can any man be my substitute in his judgment? Are we not individually accountable to our Maker for our faith and deeds? How then dare we build our faith upon the authority of men and rest our hope of salvation upon their pretended authority or works?

Equality Before God

Before God, all men stand upon a perfect level. "There is no difference: for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." "For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all." The new birth of water and the Spirit replaces both the imperial purple of an emperor and the rags of a beggar with the spotless robe of Christ's righteousness, clothing all alike with the garment of salvation. Human wisdom, virtue, holiness and keenness of mind decide nothing in things divine. Before God, human wisdom is foolishness; human righteousness, sin; and keenness of intellect, folly. To enter the kingdom of God, a philosopher must become as a little child and a little child must be endowed with wisdom from on high. It therefore follows that all are alike pledged to know the truth which alone can make us free; and, knowing the truth, to prove all things, keeping that which is good and rejecting that which is evil.

Accordingly, we see the holy apostles commending the Bereans for trying their teaching by the infallible rule of the divine Word, "searching the Scriptures daily whether those things," spoken to them by the inspired messengers of God, "were so." Instead of this being resented as a questioning of their authority, these people are commended by Paul and his fellow laborers for thus exercising their "right of private judgment." "Beloved," says St. John to the people who attended upon his preaching, "believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world." We find St. Paul, who upon occasion could emphatically assert his apostolic authority, urging the exercise of this privilege and duty upon that very congregation, which he had founded, nurtured and enriched in the knowledge of Christian truth; for, speaking to the believers of Corinth, he says: "I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say."

Plainly, it is God's will that you should exercise this right and privilege. "One is your Master, even Christ." You are to bow down before no other authority. You are to suffer no human will to lord it over your conscience. You are to submit to no majority rule in questions of doctrine. Doctrines are not decided nor truths fixed by majority votes. You are to receive no human teaching, no human book, no human resolution, without first proving it by the Word of God. As you would save your soul alive by coming to a knowledge of the truth, you cannot, you dare not give up this most precious thing, your God-given "right of private judgment."

"Ye shall know them," says our Lord, "by their fruits." Here is a privilege conferred and a direction laid down. What does he mean by the "fruits" of a prophet?

The Fruits of a Prophet

The usual answer to this question is that the teaching of men is judged by their personal character, the soundness of a creed by the concrete life which accompanies it, the character of a prophet by the virtues which adorn his walk and conversation. Certainly, this interpretation is not borne out by experience. There have been apostles of soul-destroying error whose lives were models of sweetness and purity. On the other hand, teachers have appeared whose utterances were in most perfect accord with the revealed truth, but whose lives belied and discredited their doctrines.

Another interpretation, similar to this, is also full of practical difficulties. It is claimed that our Lord means by "their fruits" the moral results of a prophet's teachings upon his hearers. This rendering robs the Saviour's words of all present force. The practical results or fruits of error are often a long time in ripening. They may not appear for years, just as the harvest of truth requires "long patience" on the part of the husbandman.

Surely, the specific fruit of a prophet is what comes from his lips, or his teaching. A false prophet may be known by his teaching. John therefore says: "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world. Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God." What is this but saying in other words: "Ye shall know them by their fruits," their confession or teaching concerning Christ. As he confesses him, he is a true prophet, for "to him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." As our Lord says in the words immediately following our text: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Ay, verily, "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day." But where is the truth of Christ to be found? "Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me."

Our judgment of our prophets and their fruits or teaching must be based upon the divinely inspired, infallible Word of God. As it squares with that, it is correct. As it fails to square with that, it is false.

Do we permit a judge to arbitrarily pronounce judgment according to his own convictions of right? Or do we insist that he base his judgment upon the statute books of the State in which he holds office? Do we permit a jury to arbitrarily render a verdict according to its own notions of right? Or do we insist that it be charged and instructed in ord that its judgment may conform to the law?

If this is done in the everyday affairs of th present life, must it not also be done in the thin of the life to come? If we are to know fal prophets by the fruit of their lips, distinguishi truth from error, belief from unbelief, righteou ness from unrighteousness, light from darknes Christ from Belial, must we not base our judgme upon God's eternal revelation of truth, the ho Scriptures, which are alone able to make us wi unto salvation through faith which is in Chri Jesus? Not our personal opinions or convictio not congregational resolutions or synodical decree but the Word of truth, is to have rule in Christ Church. "God standeth in the congregation of t mighty; he judgeth among the gods." Do you as how? "God, who at sundry times and in dive manners spake in time past unto the fathers by t prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us b his Son." Peter therefore admonishes us: "If an man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God. As he does that, so will he be a true prophet, decla ing "the whole counsel of God." As he fails c refuses to do that, so will he be a false prophe corrupting the Word of God.

"Ye shall know them," says Christ. I have n choice in this matter. My eternal destiny depend upon my personal attitude to the truth. I mus exercise my right of judgment, based upon th Word of truth. "Ye shall know them by thei fruits"—their teaching or doctrine.

The Fundamental Word

This then is the fundamental principle of th Reformation: that God's Word is the sole and abso lute authority and rule of faith and of life in th Church of God—a principle so fundamental tha without it there would have been no Reformatio The reformers knew where their strength lay They felt that what had redeemed them could alon redeem the church. They saw that, under Go their ability to sustain his cause depended on hi Word. When the great princes and free cities of ou church at Augsburg in 1530 laid their Confessio of Faith before the emperor and estates civil an ecclesiastical of the Holy Roman Empire, they said "We offer the confession of the faith held by th pastors and preachers in our several estates, an the confession of our own faith, as drawn fro the Holy Scriptures, the pure Word of God." In al lands where the great battle of the Reformation wa victoriously fought, the Bible furnished banner armor and arms.

Rome knew this then as it knows it to-day. Al its insistence upon the principle of ecclesiastical au thority, papal primacy, supremacy and infallibility all its bitter enmity against this God-given right o private judgment is at root a wilful, malicious an tagonism to the Word of God, of which it is said "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall mak you free." It is giving the lie to Him who said t every Christian: "Beware of false prophets." "Y shall know them by their fruits."

Rome with specious argument asks Protestantism to give up that sacred right. It asked the same thing of Martin Luther at Worms. He needed Rome urged, but to say one word: Revoco, I re voke. Shall I remind you of his reply: "Unless I be refuted by Scriptural testimonies, or by clear arguments—for I believe neither the Pope nor the councils alone, since it is manifest that they often erred and contradicted one another—I am convinced by the passages of Scripture which I have cited, and my conscience is bound in the Word of God: I cannot and I will not recant anything; since it is neither prudent nor safe to do aught against one's conscience. Here I stand; I can do no other. God help me. Amen."

No man can call himself truly Protestant without saying the same thing. As he would prize the Word of God, obey his Lord and Master Jesus Christ, keep the testimony of a good conscience, preserve his liberty in things spiritual as in things temporal, he must insist upon his right of private judgment. He can do no other. God help him! Amen.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, November 9. I Corinthians 8: 8-13. "Take heed lest this liberty of yours become a stumbling-block." That is a very solemn warning. My liberty may trip some one into bondage. If life were an affair of one my liberty might be wholesome, but it is an affair of many, and my liberty may be destructive to my fellows. I am not only responsible for my life, but for its influence. When a thing has been lived there is still the example to deal with. If orange-peel be thrown upon the pavement that is not the end of the feast. The man who slips over the peel is a factor in the incident, and my responsibility covers him.

I am, therefore, to consider both my deeds and their influence. How does my life trend when it touches my brother? In what way does he move because of the impact of my example? Towards liberty or towards license? To the swamps of transgression or to the fields of holiness? These are determining questions, and I must not seek to escape or ignore them. My brother is a vital part of my life. I must never shut him out of my sight. How is he influenced by my example? "If meat make my brother to stumble I will eat no flesh while the world standeth."

MONDAY, November 10. Deuteronomy 34: 1-12. "Moses the servant of the Lord died." "The rich man also died." "The beggar died." Here is the great commonplace which reduces us all to one level. Our widely diverging roads have here a common end. "I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God." But the small and the great lose their worldly differences when they enter the portals of death. The day that Pierpont Morgan died one of my poorest members died, and she hadn't ten dollars in the world! But they met at one bourn! Nero and Onesimus ultimately passed through one gate, and neither had any earthly retinue. The retinue was waiting on the other side of the gate, but for which of the pilgrims?

It is not wise to be always thinking of death; it is foolish never to think of it at all. It is a most momentous stage in our pilgrimage; how shall we go through it? Will it be dark or illumined? Shall we be all alone, or shall we have a Friend? Can we make any preparation for the transition? Will "to die be gain"? Surely these are wise and sober questions, and a wise response will not impoverish life, but enlarge it, and fill it with a grave dignity, because it will unite the passing day with the eternal morn.

TUESDAY, November 11. Deuteronomy 31: 1-8. "Be strong and of a good courage." Such is the counsel of the Old Testament. "Be strengthened in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." Such is the counsel of the New. The first is an ideal, the second is an evangel. The first gives good advice, the second gives good news. One is addressed to the will, the other is addressed to the heart. Both show the difficult road, but only one reveals how to tread it. The first is almost like a commandment; the second names the dynamic by which the commandment is to be obeyed.

Now it is our privilege to live in the new dispensation. The Christ has been unveiled, he who is the fountain of our life. All virtue can be fed and nourished in his truth. All graces can be grown in his grace. Every form of loveliness can be created in his love. And thus a strong courage can be reared even in a trembling soul. Moral oaks and cedars can be raised in Christ Jesus. "Thou, O Christ, art all I want." In him is my resource, the solvent of all my fears. He is with me on the hardest field; and in the most hostile circumstances I can trust and not be afraid.

WEDNESDAY, November 12. Deuteronomy 32: 48-52. "Because ye trespassed against me"; "because ye sanctified me not." Sin sends its foul influence through the years. Deeds are not done with when they are done; their influence abides. The Bible never slackens its severity against sin. Its rigors are never relaxed. The frown is always upon it, the pale of judgment is never taken away. It never permits us to minimize a sin, to think of it as "a little one," to regard it as a trifle, which we may just throw away as an old envelope, and leave behind us in the track of the years. Sin has the power of pursuit. What we thought we had left behind dogs our footsteps, and we cannot bribe any one to fasten it up. "Be sure your sins will find you out."

"God is not mocked." We cannot play with fire with impunity. Fire burns, water drowns, sin destroys. Every sin is a minister of destruction. It is its very nature to consume spiritual treasure; it burns like vitriol, it is as putrifying as death. We are foolish if we refuse to quietly look at these things. It is the part of wisdom not to ignore the divine sovereignty, and God's unquenchable hatefulness of all sin. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

THURSDAY, November 13. I Thessalonians 4: 13-18. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again . . ." That is the eastern light which fills the valley of time with wonderful beams of glory. It is the great dawn in which we find the promise of our own day. Everything wears a new face in the light of our Lord's resurrection. I once watched the dawn on the east coast of England. Before there was a gray streak in the sky everything was held in grimmest gloom. The toil of the two fishing-boats seemed very somber. The sleeping houses on the shore looked the abodes of death. Then came gray light, and then the sun, and everything was transfigured! Every window in every cottage caught the reflected glory, and the fishing-boats glittered in morning radiance.

And everything is transfigured in the risen Christ. Everything is lit up when "the Sun of righteousness arises, with healing in his wings." Life is lit up, and so is death, and so are sorrow, and daily labor, and human friendships! Everything catches the gleam, and is changed. "We are no longer of the night but of the day." "Walk as children of light." "Awake, thou that sleepest, arise from the dead, and Christ shall shine upon thee."

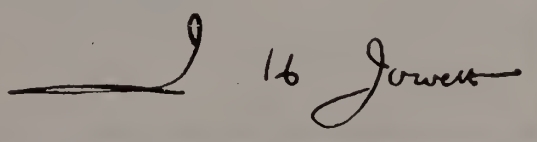
FRIDAY, November 14. Luke 12: 35-40. "Let your loins be girded about." Loose garments can be very troublesome. An Oriental robe, if left ungirdled, entangles the feet, or is caught by the wind and hinders one's goings. And therefore the wearer binds the loose attire together with a girdle, and makes it firm and compact about his body. And loose principles can be more dangerous than loose garments. Indefinite opinions, caught by the passing wind of popular caprice, are both a peril and a burden. Many people go through life with loose beliefs and purposes, and they never arrive at any glorious goal. "Let your loins be girded about." Bind your loose thinkings together, with the girdle of truth, into firm and saving conviction.

"And your lights burning." Be ready for the emergency. When the darkness falls don't have to hasten away to buy oil. Look after your resources, and be competent to meet the crisis when it comes. Let the light of conscience be burning with clear flame, like a brilliant lighthouse on a dangerous shore. Let the light of love be burning, like a lamp which sends its friendly, cheery beams to the pilgrims of the night. "Our sufficiency is of God," and the oil of grace will keep the lights burning through the longest night.

SATURDAY, November 15. Psalm 39. "Thou hast made my days as an handbreadth." How few they are, and therefore of what priceless value! A day is very short, and it needs very expert living to get much into it. Travelers with big trunks pack carelessly; those who carry small baggage can utilize every nook and corner. It is amazing what some people can pack into a day, and they always seem to have room for something more. If we could only have seen "one of the days of the Son of man" we should have wondered at its contents! And our brief days can be filled with his fulness, the fulness that made time for rest, and included seasons for going into the desert place apart.

Our time is part of our sacred capital, and it is to be invested for God. It need not be always employed in grim seriousness, and in tragic tasks. The lighter hours can be irradiated with grace, our merriment may have all the colors of the rainbow around the throne, and our seasons of rest may be filled with heavenly peace. But through all the hours, grave and gay, there can be the spirit of consecration, as the red strand runs continuously through every inch of the Alpine rope.

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913



IN THE PEWS

BLANCHE FARGO GRISWOLD

OBLIQUELY, like a stairway lowered from the sky,
The sunshine filters through the mullioned windows high
In glorious beams of purple, orange, red and blue.
Upon the pulpit lovely flowers of varied hue
Breathe forth their fragrance sweet, an incense to the day,
With prayers and music mingling on their heav'nward way.
The peace that fills the house of God has reached my heart
And worry is forgot, faith wakes and does its part.
The rankling bitterness, the thought that was not kind,
"Forgive me, Lord, I'll banish them from heart and mind."
Ah, now the choir is singing, singing soft and low;
How sweetly all their voices blend! Will they sing so
Before the great white throne above? And, daughter dear,
Shall I—sometime up there—shall I your loved voice hear
A-singing in God's choir? The pastor rises. (Bless Him, Lord!) How sad his eyes! I wonder does he guess
The sinfulness my heart has held? Ah, if—if he—
He has, and that is why he's talking straight to me!
How strange! He understands. The heart he seems to read,
And o'er the failings seen his prayers and sermons plead.
"Dear Father, hear his prayer, and help Thou me each day
To live the better life the pastor prays I may!"

The UNLOCKED GATES

By Alice J. Whittier

I FACE me toward the sunset sky,
And all my soul is glad;
For the evening holds a glory
Which the morning never had.
Out far, far out across the plain
The mighty mountains rise,
A purple bar against the flood
Of glory from the skies.

The golden tide has conquered;
It breaks above the crest,
And flings its spray across the sky
Till all the land is blest.
Out far, far out across the plain,
Within that rosy glow,
I think I see a jasper wall
And ramparts that I know.

I lean to see, and from the gates
Of gleaming pearls set wide,
The blessed gates that never close,
Rolls out the sunset tide.
Out far, far out across the plain
I strain my soul to hear;
Now faint, now clear I catch the strain,
A wondrous song of cheer.

O City of the unlocked gates!
Chime forth thy message clear.
A million faces toward the West
Are famishing to hear.
The unlocked gates! The unlocked gates
Of that great wall foursquare!
The gates that never close by day,
And never night is there!

On every side three gates are set,
And face they North and West
And East and South, that none need miss
The City of the Blest.
Out far, far out across the plain
I see the "narrow ways"
Lead on through chill and fearsome nights
And burning, blinding days.

O Love that all the temple is!
The Glory and the Light!
O Father of all lonely hearts,
Guide, guide our steps aright!
Then far, far out across the plain
I send you this glad call;
Oh, face to face our hearts shall meet
Within the city's wall.

O Friend of shining silver crown Touched by the City's Light!
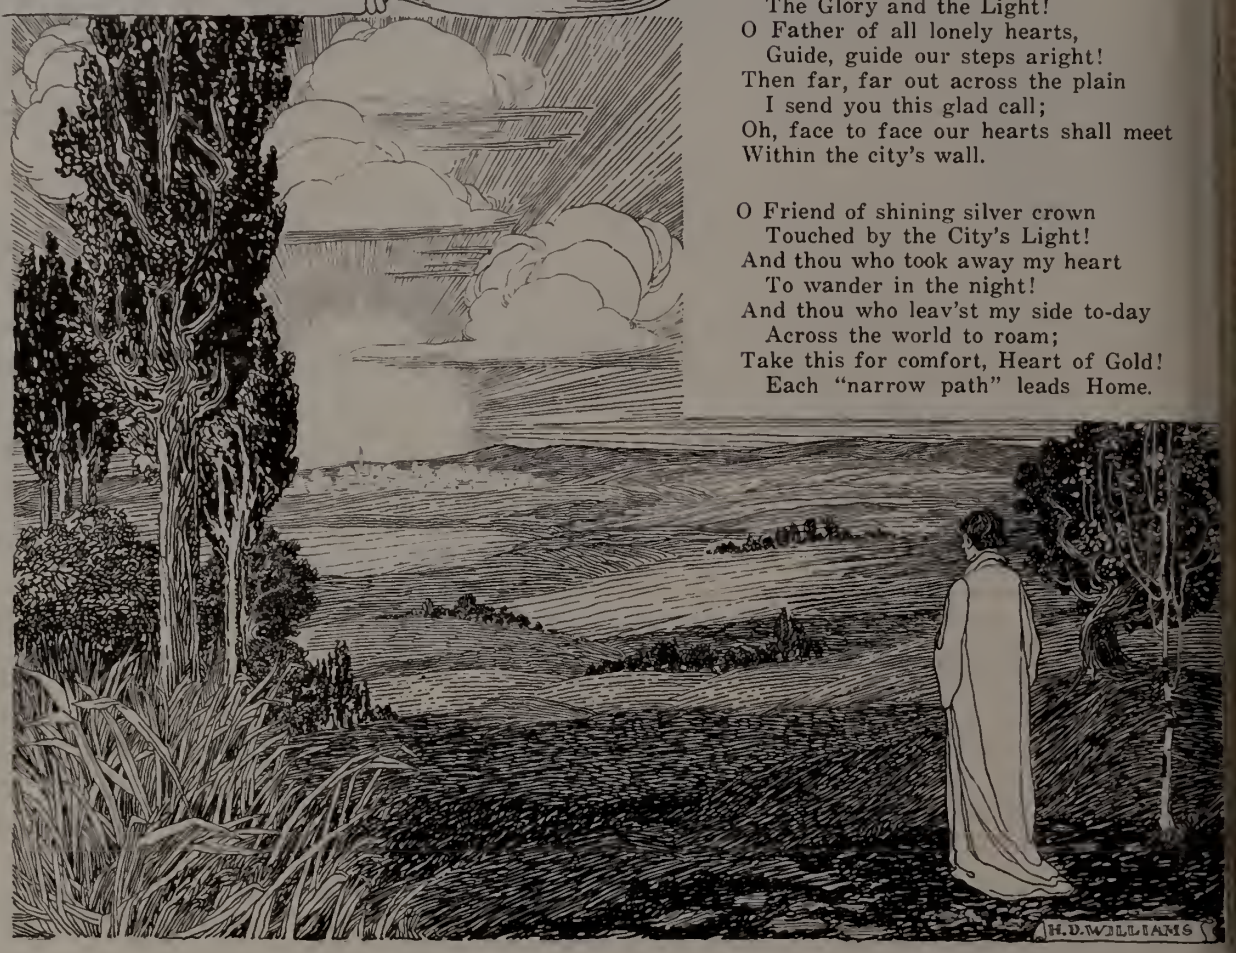
And thou who took away my heart
To wander in the night!
And thou who leav'st my side to-day
Across the world to roam;
Take this for comfort, Heart of Gold!
Each "narrow path" leads Home.



FORTY YEARS OF TEMPERANCE WORK

WITH the opening of the ninth triennial World's Christian Temperance Union Convention in Brooklyn and the celebration of the annual W. C. T. U. assembly at Asbury Park, N. J., the Women's Christian Temperance Union inaugurates its fortieth year of public service for national reform. The world convention, which opened in Brooklyn on October 23, was the greatest in the history of the Union. Women from all parts of America and delegates representing thirty foreign nations participated in the meetings. Lady Aurea Howard, youngest daughter of the Countess of Carlisle and world's president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, presided at the Brooklyn gathering. "White Ribbon" special trains from the South and West came in on the 22d, bringing hundreds of women for the convention.

The first day of the convention was Devotional Day and was occupied by meetings at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn. In the evening there was a reception to the world's officers and foreign delegates at the Hotel Astor, Manhattan. The following three days were filled with morning, afternoon and evening sessions held in the Academy of Music in Brooklyn, at which all the problems of national and world temperance were discussed. On the evening of the 26th a special young people's meeting was held in the Baptist Temple in Brooklyn. The following day was left free for visits to Ellis Island, the Metropolitan Museum, West Point, and points of interest in and about New York City.

On the 29th the meetings of the National Executive and Official Board began in Asbury Park. These sessions, devoted entirely to the interests of the temperance campaign in the United States, continued through the first few days of November and were attended by not only the large majority of the American delegates who had been present at the world's convention in Brooklyn, but also a number of the foreign delegates.

The conventions celebrate the epoch making event which occurred in December, 1873, when women in several Ohio towns under the inspiration of faith and prayer moved in concerted action against the saloons. This was the memorable Ohio Crusade, which, in a few weeks, swept the liquor traffic out of 250 towns and villages, and crystallized in the organization of Christian women for the protection of the home, the abolition of the liquor traffic, and the triumph of Christ's Golden Rule in custom and in law.

Nine States entirely without saloons and two-thirds of the United States "dry" territory are the conditions which to-day cheer the earnest workers who have kept up the agitation against the drink evil for two-score years, against discouragement and in the face of unpopularity.

From the beginning the White Ribbon women have been working to put something in the heads of the people besides a headache. Through its evangelistic department, of which Rev. Mary E. Kuhl of Illinois is the superintendent, the National Women's Christian Temperance Union has aimed to give spiritual training to the individual worker, and it has held Gospel missions and conferences, services in jails, halls, cottages, depots, everywhere keeping alive the sacred fire kindled in the crusade of forty years ago.

In Michigan (which is the first State to offer a concurrent resolution requesting the United States Congress to pass an amendment to the Federal Constitution forbidding the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage) they are in a campaign for Statewide prohibition.

Through the efforts of White Ribboners, the white slave law has passed this year in Missouri, where the political backbone of the liquor element is being broken.

Many victories for local option have marked the past year in Minnesota. In the District of Columbia the busy workers are enlarging the dry zone.

In Iowa the drinking of intoxicants has been prohibited by law in State institutions. Legislation gains have been greater in Oregon than at any time during the past twenty-five years. In South Dakota a law has been passed making the sale of liquor to minors unlawful, even with the consent of parents or guardians; and another prohibits the location of a saloon within five miles of a dry town. Resolutions providing for the appointment of commissions for the investigation of conditions responsible for the white slave traffic have been introduced into many States, including Illinois, Minnesota, Michigan, Missouri, California, Iowa, and Pennsylvania. In West Virginia, the latest dry State, a measure to enforce Statewide prohibition has been enacted. The passage of the Kenyon-Webb law, stopping interstate shipments of liquor to points where State laws prohibit its sale, is regarded as the greatest victory of recent years. Another great source of rejoicing is the action of the Isthmian Canal Commission, which decided to issue no saloon licenses after July 1, 1913.

Forty-one departments of work are listed by the National Women's Christian Temperance Union. Among the leading ones is that of scientific temperance teaching, which is conducting training schools for temperance teachers.

Nearly three hundred thousand members are now enrolled in the National Women's Christian Temperance Union, which has a strong foothold in every State and Territory. A constant gain in membership has been made during the past decade, averaging fifteen thousand yearly. The work of organization is now being promoted among foreign-speaking people, colored people, and Indians. Among the most prominent measures advocated are the suppression of the white slave traffic, an anti-polygamy amendment to the United States Constitution, the preservation of the gains already made in the form of Federal departmental rulings, the establishment of five-mile zones, and finally the enactment of national constitutional prohibition.

General Notes

—THE MEN AND WOMEN of the Interior Department in Washington, D. C., are to have a club of their own. It is to be called the Home Club, because the department was originally designated as the Home Department. It is to be a purely social organization, composed exclusively of members of the Interior Department and their families. It is proposed to secure a building with spacious quarters, reading-rooms, and all the accessories of a modern club, and which will have a hall for such entertainments as the members may desire.

—A SHORT DESPATCH from Washington a few days ago showed that our national anthem has not yet received the recognition which is accorded the acknowledged national songs of almost all other countries of the world. J. Frank Wahl, who had once served in the United States Army, rose and stood at attention in a public gathering in Washington when "The Star-Spangled Banner" was played by the band. Instead of starting the general rise of the audience, which, by the way, is usually disgracefully half-hearted, the ex-soldier was ejected for "creating disorder." He has engaged legal counsel and is suing for damages to test the laws on this subject.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

The Author of "In His Steps," Etc., Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

A group of friends are gathered in the library of Rev. Henry Maxwell, pastor of First Church, Raymond, on the anniversary of the day when they had taken the pledge to make "What would Jesus Do?" the test of their daily lives. In the group are Virginia Page and Richard Stanton, Mr. Maxwell's new assistant. They are all commenting upon a marvelous light which has been appearing in the sky, when Martha, Mrs. Maxwell's maid, enters the room with the exclamation: "Jesus is here!" She declares that he came to the service of the Rectangle Church, a mission founded by First Church, and had gone home with Mr. Grey, the pastor. Mr. Maxwell calls up Mr. Grey by telephone and is informed that the strange Guest is now asleep in his home. Mr. Grey himself comes to the Maxwell home, and relates the details of Jesus' visit to his church. All discuss the probable attitude of the press toward Jesus. Jasper Carter, editor and proprietor of the Evening Gazette, is intent upon a sensational story, and sends his best reporter, Barnes, and a cartoonist, Logan, to get the facts and photographs. Both men expose plates, but can get no results. Barnes is almost convinced while writing his story that this is Jesus. There is a great sensation in Raymond. That night Virginia Page and Rachel Page, her sister-in-law, are in Virginia's home. They watch the marvelous Light, and Rachel teases Virginia about the new assistant. This leads to the subject of how Jesus was attired.

CHAPTER III—Continued

IT WAS with a sense of bewilderment that the two women admitted that they could give no description of the clothes Jesus had worn. There was a long thoughtful pause while Rachel, cuddling her children, crooned a little night song, and looking down at the happy sleeping faces, said, "About bedtime, children."

But it was so serene there in the old library where Virginia and she had in the past gone over so much together that was so great in their Christian experience that Rachel lingered and went on to speak again of the wonderful to-morrow.

"We shall have to go early to get in. They say everybody will be there."

"I long for it, and at the same time I dread it," Virginia said. "I cannot bear the thought of some things that may happen. The vulgar curiosity, the impertinence, the newspaper accounts, the—"

"But," Rachel interrupted gently, "He endured things like that when he was here before, and he always silenced his enemies. Do you believe he will fail in our age of the world? The people are the same now as then."

"Yes, the people. The common people are always the same. But how about the rulers, the financiers, the proud and exclusive, the so-called great—how will they treat him?"

"The same as they did before, no doubt," Rachel said sadly. "But you must remember, Virginia, how many more good people there are now than then. Think of the church people. Think of the missionaries and Christian workers all over the world who will welcome him. Before, he came to his own, and his own received him not. Is it to be thought of that his own disciples, thousands of them, will not receive him to-day?"

"No, I cannot believe that. No. His church will welcome him. And did not Martha say again and again that when he spoke to them last night he had only words of comfort and praise for the church?"

"That was one of the first reasons why I began to believe in him. He has come to cheer his own disciples, to enlarge their definition of themselves, and declare to them the power they possess. Not to denounce and criticize, but to inspire and encourage."

There was another silence. Then Rachel said: "I have been thinking of Mr. Stanton also, and rejoicing in the fact that Mr. Maxwell is to have such a fine assistant. Did you notice what a splendid voice he has?"

"Yes."

"Most men have common voices, Virginia. Of course Rollin is an exception." Rachel laughed happily.

"Rachel," Virginia spoke wistfully, looking at her as she sat there in all her motherly beauty, folding her children in her arms, "your married life has been a joy to you, hasn't it?"

"It has been heaven to me."

"Those children—how much they mean to you!"

"I believe I should die if anything should happen to the darlings. Eloise has not been real well today. But nothing serious."

Another silence, broken this time by Virginia.

"Mr. Stanton seemed to me to be something of a mystic as well as a man of affairs."

"Do you object to that?"

"Oh, no. I rather like that combination in a man. It makes an interesting person."

"I hope he will be as interesting a preacher as he is a talker. Sometimes a man with a good voice like his loses it when he begins to preach."

"I don't believe he will. He will have too much common sense."

"It is to be hoped he will. And oh, let us hope he will not 'holler.' Let us hope that, won't we, Virginia?"

"By all means. If he 'hollers' I shall not go to church. Mr. Maxwell has set us all a high example that way," Virginia laughed.

RACHEL WAS ON HER KNEES, HER ARMS FLUNG OUT ACROSS THE BED

The bell rang, and a moment after, the maid announced, "Mr. Stanton to see Mrs. Page."

"Mrs. Page?" Virginia had risen.

"Yes, he said Mr. Maxwell told him Mrs. Page was here while her husband was in Chicago, and he has stepped in with a message from Mr. Maxwell to her."

Rachel rose and put the children on the couch.

"We will both go," she said to Virginia. And taking her hand she drew her into the hall reception room where Stanton was standing.

He sat down at Rachel's invitation and said he would remain only a few moments.

"Mr. Maxwell is very anxious to have you sing to-morrow, Mrs. Page. I know you have told him you are out of practice and all that, and that you had expected to be absent in Chicago to-morrow. But now you are here, he feels that no one can sing as you can, and he wants you to-morrow, especially. That is my errand. I hope you will sing."

During the years of her married life Rachel had gradually dropped her music, and as much of her time had been spent in Chicago, where, of late, Rollin had been so much engaged, she had given up her place in the choir of First Church. But her voice had still the charm of the old days, and she loved to sing to her friends.

She said instantly, "Tell Mr. Maxwell I will sing, and do my best."

"Thank you," Stanton said simply. Then he added, as if it were the most natural thing in the world,

"I have just come from Mr. Maxwell's, and—I—have seen Jesus."

Again that silence—that pause—which the world was going to note so wonderfully in its feverish life.

"There is no doubt about it. Mr. Maxwell met him at Mr. Grey's this morning. The moment he faced him he tells me all his doubt vanished. He cried out, 'My Lord and my God!' We have been visiting together this afternoon and evening."

"It is so wonderful," Virginia murmured. "Tell us, Mr. Stanton, something about him."

"Martha described him," Stanton smiled. "He is like an average man, only different. Oh, the world, the common people, his church, will receive him. I have no question about that. They cannot help it. He is so human and brotherly. Why, do you know, he actually told two or three remarkably delightful stories while we were talking together."

Both Virginia and Rachel looked shocked.

"Mr. Stanton!" they both exclaimed.

"And why not? Is humor ungodlike? Have not the best men we know lightened life's griefs and softened its sorrows and eased its burdens by humor? I always feel afraid of a person who does not have any."

"But it does not seem quite right—"

"Then we must change our definitions of God and divinity," Stanton said almost shortly. After a moment he added gently, "There is an indescribable charm about him that is simply overpowering. I could not help being proud every minute that I was a Christian. And it also seemed to me every minute that I was in the presence of a person who could do most wonderful things, miracles—such as he used to do. Heal the sick, raise the dead."

"Do you think he will?" Rachel asked the question, not without a tone of indifference, as if she were not much concerned in it.

"I do not believe he will do any wonders to satisfy any curiosity."

Rachel rose and excused herself to put her children to bed. As she went out of the room, Virginia was saying: "Mr. Stanton, we are all so glad to have this great event at the time you are beginning your work here."

"It is the astounding event of my whole life, Miss Page. What ought we not to expect for the church from his presence?" Virginia did not reply, and Mr. Stanton rose to go.

"You will excuse me, Miss Page. I have much to do to prepare for to-morrow." He paused, then added, "I would like to have you know, Miss Page, how much I appreciate coming to First Church. Of course, I know its wonderful history and the great part you and Mrs. Page and your brother and others have had in it. It will be a rare privilege to work in such an atmosphere."

Virginia was looking at the assistant pastor of the First Church with a grave, steady look out of her eyes, as she said with direct frankness so natural to her:

"We are all delighted to have you in the church to help Mr. Maxwell—and—all of us. I—we wish you every strength and blessing in it, Mr. Stanton."

"Thank you," Stanton said. He shook hands and went out. Virginia had gone to the door. When it closed, she went back into the library and stood there looking out of the window. The window commanded a view of the walk past the church. Stanton went by on this walk. What made Virginia draw back a little as his tall figure passed?

Helping Unconsciously

IN a thousand ways, the men and women who have God's love in their hearts and something of his goodness in their conduct and character are the preserving and purifying force in the midst of this corrupt world. Not usually of set purpose and by determined effort, however; for the most part it will be an unconscious work of blessing. It is said that when Thorwaldsen, the great Danish sculptor, returned to his native land with those wonderful works of art which have made his name immortal, chiseled in Italy with patient toil and glowing inspiration, the servants who unpacked the marbles scattered upon the ground the straw that was wrapped around them. And lo, the next summer, flowers from the gardens of Rome were blooming in the streets of Copenhagen, from the seeds brought and planted undesignedly. While eagerly pursuing his chosen art, and leaving splendid results in breathing marble, the artist was at the same time and unconsciously scattering other beautiful things in his path to give cheer and gladness. So God's faithful workers unconsciously bless the world. All day long as they toil at their tasks, in shop or kitchen, in field or office, words of heavenly gentleness drop from their lips, and seeds of heavenly purity are scattered about them, and to-morrow flowers from the garden of God spring up in the dusty ways of earth. There is a little less of evil, a little more of good in the world. The best religion is not all talking and praying in meeting and visiting the sick. A star does not talk, yet its steady beam shining down continually out of the sky is a sweet benediction. A flower cannot sing bird-songs, but its fragrance and beauty make it a blessing whenever it is seen. Be like the star in your peaceful shining, and many will thank God for your life. Be like the flower in your pure beauty of character and the influence of your unselfish spirit, and you may do more to help the world than many who talk with ever-ready tongue.

A Convention on Divorce

ONE of the closing incidents in the Protestant Episcopal Convention was the passage of a resolution calling for an international congress to be held at the Panama Exposition in May, 1915, "for the purpose of awakening the conscience of the American people toward the great evil of divorce and remarriage." There was some pretty plain talk in discussing the resolution. It was admitted that there might be opposition in certain States to any attempt to secure a uniform divorce law, which might be resisted as an invasion of State sovereignty. Another speaker characterized the present age as "one of increasing license and covetousness," recalling the last stages of the Roman Empire, when wifehood was held in small esteem. While many will reject this extreme view of the situation, it should be evident to any student of divorce statistics that matters have reached a point where a uniform law on both marriage and divorce seems to be the only solution of the disorder now prevailing, due to the conflict of statutes in many States. All the religious denominations should be represented at the proposed convention, and each should do its share in the work of bringing order out of moral chaos and preserving the integrity of the American home.

Russia and the Jews

JEWS throughout the world are deeply interested in a trial now going on at Kiev, Russia, the defendant being a Hebrew named Mendel Beilis, who is charged with "ritual murder." About a year and a half ago, a native Russian boy of Christian parentage was killed by persons then unknown. Lately, the crime was proclaimed by the Russian authorities to have been a "sacrifice," in which the blood of the Christian child was used for ceremonial purposes. At various times in the past the charge of "ritual" murder has been brought against the Jewish race by their persecutors, and although abundant evidence has been adduced to disprove such accusations, they still persist. On different occasions the excitement aroused has resulted in riot and massacre. There is a strong presumption that the case against Beilis has been brought for the purpose of stirring up religious feeling against the Czar's Jewish subjects and precipitating a "pogrom," similar to those which disgraced Russia a decade ago, when the unrestrained religious fanaticism of the ignorant classes caused the loss of many innocent Jewish lives. In the trial at Kiev, a mass of conflicting testimony has been heard by the court, some of it apparently pointing to a plot to stifle the real facts and make the crime a Semitic ecclesiastical murder. Although the actual perpetrator, a Russian, is said to have confessed, official influence interposed to prevent honest investigation and the facts were suppressed. While other nations deal justly with the Jew, Russia treats him as an outlaw. Here is an excellent opportunity for the Kiev court to set a new precedent by ignoring fanatical clamor and political pressure and rendering justice to the Jew in accordance with the facts.

Our Duty to the Prisoner

IT IS a serious indictment of our modern prison system which Chairman Thomas Mott Osborne of the New York State Committee on Prison Reform presents as the result of one week's voluntary incarceration in Auburn Prison. Desiring to test by personal experience the true character and reformative value of prison life, he submitted to the rules, wore the convict dress, slept in a cell, ate the convict rations, and performed his share of the assigned tasks. He did not spare himself, and even violated the regulations in order that he might be committed to the dungeon as a punishment. His report is a simple, straightforward statement of facts and conclusions, without exaggeration or concealment, and it will probably be made a basis for prison reform legislation. He found the system "unintelligent, ineffective and cruel." The convict becomes a mere irresponsible machine, with a slavish treadmill routine and nothing in prospect to help him in deciding his future when his term shall end. It is "a frightful waste of human life and ingenuity," Mr. Osborne declares, and the principle of reformation is wholly lost sight of. The fact that the food may be clean and eatable does not compensate for the total absence of a moral atmosphere. A convict is regarded not as a human being, deserving of sympathy or guidance, but as a soulless thing, to be tamed and cowed while in prison, and when released, to be under close surveillance lest he turn and rend society. There is in the prison régime no thought of moral betterment, no idea of reformatory effort, or of the remaking of a man by the use of those influences that would kindle the desire for a better life. Some may class Mr. Osborne as a visionary, and there are many who hold that the police maxim, "once a criminal, always a criminal," is a good one, and who believe that for society's sake the offender should suffer the natural consequences of his misdeeds; but it is undeniable that a prison system which is merely punitive and not reconstructive is itself a serious menace to society and must inevitably become a training school of crime. Unless we strive to arouse the better nature and to awaken the soul of the convict, we miss the one great principle which alone makes a prison system civilized and humane and worthy of toleration.

Our Militant Guest

ASSUREDLY Mrs. Pankhurst, the leader of the militant suffrage wing in England, has reason for gratification at her American welcome. All questions as to her outstanding difficulties with the British Government have been waived and without a bond, but on her simple promise to respect the law she has been accorded the same right of political asylum which this nation has always extended to those who deserve it. The American sense of gallantry revolted at putting up the bars against a woman, and in deference to the public demand for a fair hearing, she was admitted on her own recognizances. Her first public address at Madison Square Garden, however, was not precisely the multitudinous triumph her friends had anticipated. There was nothing of the wildly rampant militant in her language, and those who had hoped to witness an exciting scene were disappointed. "It is not necessary in the United States for women to be militant, as we have to be," she frankly acknowledged; "but we in England are doing the fighting for all the women in the world." Her account of militancy in England and her justification of it did not seem to specially interest her audience. They failed to take seriously the soft-voiced, even-tempered little woman, who spoke so quietly and good-naturedly, when they had looked for a fire-eating Gorgon, whose very glance would make the creature man tremble. Mrs. Pankhurst's moderation, however, is much more likely to win friends here than if she had "cut loose" on the platform, although she may miss some of the golden harvest she expected to carry home with her to finance the English militant campaign.

Talking to Mars

THE old story that the inhabitants of Mars may be trying to talk to us has come up again. Professor LeContre, of Switzerland, stated the other day that the occasional flashes of light observed on our neighboring planet may be artificially produced in an effort to get into communication with the earth.

There is always something fascinating about this idea of exchanging messages with the voyagers on other ships through the vast seas of space. Certainly, with our limited intelligence, it would be unwise to declare such communication impossible. The theory has been revived that, since there can be no common language, the beginnings of communication would take the form of picture-writing. Geographical or geometric designs might be displayed by blazing lights, for instance, on the desert of Sahara, which the Martians, if such a race exists, might answer by corresponding diagrams.

Weird fancies, these! The vast distances are probably too great for communication; certainly too great for projecting living bodies from one planet to another. Yet, after all, the distances are not so great as they seem. A million miles is scarcely an inch in the measurements of the universe. The cosmos of matter has nothing to offer the soul, longing for immortality. There is a vaster universe, the universe of spirit. Throughout and beyond all space is God. Daily and hourly we may talk with him, not by fantastic and difficult signs, but in the comfortable language of friendship. We may face fearlessly the gigantic mysteries of the universe and the death which will, we know, end our earth existence. Somewhere, among the "many mansions," we shall find a home with him and with his friends, many of whom have also been our friends here.

RESOLUTIONS were adopted at a union meeting of the Protestant ministers of Chicago on September 29, urging the city government of San Francisco and the board of directors of the Panama Canal Exposition "to adopt every means to prevent the exploiting of the exposition by commercialized vice, and to protect the visitors to San Francisco from such influence as would tend to lower public morals and injure the good name of San Francisco in America."

Horrible Zeppelin Airship Tragedy

THE L-2, the latest and largest ship of the German naval air fleet, started out on her last trial trip on October 17 from Johannesthal. The preliminary trials were successful, but on this one an admiralty trial board, composed of experienced aviators, balloonists, and engineers, the highest officers of the air navy, were aboard to make certain that the dirigible met all the requirements of the contract for her construction. These officers seated themselves in the gondola suspended from the huge gas-bag. How proud and happy they were, and how secure they felt in the airship, 525 feet long and 54 feet in diameter, and having an 820-horse-power motor equipment, may well be imagined. Count Zeppelin built it to make the Kaiser monarch of the air, expecting it to cross the Atlantic, and the officers shared the belief of the maker. Beside their steersman was Captain Glund, who had made a thousand successful air voyages. Arising majestically, the balloon started for Berlin. Scarce fifteen minutes had elapsed when an explosion sounded aloft. The motors had exploded. Almost instantly the horrified spectators saw a pillar of fire shoot into the air, igniting the covering of inflammable silk and cotton, held together by pitchy substances. Another moment passed and an explosion more frightful followed. The fire had reached the two tons of petrol, the airship's fuel. That was the end. The hope of Germany's conquest of the air fell like a stone. Aviators, spectators, all ran to the rescue. Of the twenty-eight splendid men all but two were dead, and one of them died as they cut him out from the redhot steel wreckage. The navigation of the air has been attended by a succession of tragedies; this one is the worst of all. Only about two months ago the L-1 was destroyed by a hurricane. Not disheartened by disaster, Count Zeppelin built the monster L-2, the pride of the German emperor and people and himself, and yet it burned up like a child's toy on the trial voyage. Death has pursued the conquerors of the air in both branches of aerial navigation, but it has been more cruel with the balloonists. Those sailing heavier-than-air ships have come nearer to perfection. From the Wright brothers down to Pegoud, there has been a succession of brilliant victories, though at a fearful toll of precious life. The world feels sorry for Count Zeppelin, an old, old man, honored in Germany, but so fated in his practical experiments. The tragedies of the air are matched by those of the sea, where the ship burns and over a hundred lives are lost; or on the land, where the train falls through the bridge and American soldiers perish. These and the other tragedies of life suggest obedience to the injunction:

Boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth. (Prov. 27: 1.)

THE ZEPPELIN GERMAN MILITARY AIRSHIP "L-2"

Folly of Two Generals

BY a cablegram from Paris it is learned that a challenge to a duel was sent by one French septuagenarian warrior, General Bosc, who is seventy-two, to another still older general, Georges Florentine, seventy-seven, Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honor. The cause of the quarrel was that legal proceedings had been started by General Florentine to prevent the members of a military society, the Society of National Merit, founded by General Bosc, from wearing a button among its insignia, and thus infringing on the privilege of members of the Legion of Honor. It is to be hoped that these old heroes, both of whom have admirably served their country, will cool down in their anger and behave in a manner becoming men of their character and service, and avoid the public disgrace and double crime of murder and suicide in the heart. When they were young men the appeal to the "code of honor" was pretty nearly universally admitted to be the proper thing under the circumstances. But the times have gotten so much better since then that the proposition of the duel seems the pitiful expression of the folly of a second childhood. With a splendid life behind them, and the other world and its accounting just before them, it would be thought incredible that the empty badge of an empty earthly honor should be made a matter of life and death. It is to be hoped that the challenge will not be accepted, and that friends will lend their kind offices to prevent them from breaking this commandment:

Thou shalt not kill. (Ex. 20: 13.)

Fasted for Forty-seven Days

MRS. F. W. McCANN, of Conlee, Wash., has, under the direction of her physician, fasted forty-seven days, taking nothing but water. At present the fast is unbroken. Mrs. Eliza Hazard, of Seattle, is reported to have fasted forty-five days, and a physician of St. Paul, Minn., also forty-five days. There have been reports of sixty-one days, but Mrs. McCann, it is claimed, has broken the world's record for fasting by women. "She weighed 145 pounds when she began to fast, and now weighs only 100 pounds. Mrs. McCann observed the fast hoping for the cure of a chronic disease. Fasting, as a religious exercise, has been practiced well nigh universally since the race began. It was observed by the ancient Parsis of Irania. The early Chinese and Hindus carried it to an injurious excess. Though the Vedas attach little importance to the mortification of the body, yet the ceremony the Hindu considers necessary to his purification requires a fast of twelve days. While the only fast Moses required was the one of the great day of annual atonement, the Jews adopted fasting as a necessary part of their religion. Christ bitterly rebuked the substitution of the fast for the thing sought in the fast, and appointed not even a day for fasting, although he taught the real meaning and benefit of such abstinence by example and precept. The early church continued the fasting of Judaism, and soon lost the idea of penitence and dependence and supplication it was expected to contain and took the form as their substitute. Reasonable fasting in these days would prove beneficial to health, although the long fast of the invalid could hardly be followed safely as a rule. Her fast, at this time not yet broken, is seven days longer than that of Jesus, according to this record of the evangelist:

And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterward a hungered. (Matt. 4: 2.)

Lord Chief Justice Isaacs

SIR RUFUS ISAACS has accepted the appointment of Lord Chief Justice of England in succession to Baron Alverstone, who is created a viscount. Sir Rufus Isaacs is the first Jew to be Lord Chief Justice, as he was the first of his race to be appointed attorney general and the first attorney general to have a seat in the cabinet. He has been attorney general since 1910. He is a son of the late Joseph Isaacs, a London merchant, and was born October 10, 1860. He was educated at Brussels and at Hanover. He stands in a long line of distinguished chief justices, who have had so much to do in maintaining the stability of British institutions. Some of the ablest lawyers and statesmen of England, and, in fact, of all nations, have been and are Jews. The Jewish nation gave the Mosaic code, which is the basis of the jurisprudence of the world. This is the divine command:

Set magistrates and judges, which may judge all the people. And whosoever will not do the law of thy God, and the law of the king, let judgment be executed speedily upon him, whether it be unto death, or to banishment, or to confiscation of goods, or to imprisonment. (Ezra 7: 25, 26.)

National Apple Day Celebration

TUESDAY, October 21, was selected by all fruit-growing sections and trade associations as the day on which interest was to be centered on one of the most valuable fruits of the world. The date was National Apple Day, which was set apart nine years ago, and which has been celebrated annually with increasing interest. Its primary purpose is educational, and it has awakened a national pride in the culture of a fruit that the United States produces in unequaled quality and quantity. At the recent anniversary in many apple-growing regions the schools devoted the day to special written articles on the apple, and hundreds of "samples" were given to the poor, to orphan asylums, and to hospitals. According to the report of the president of the International Fruit Shippers' Association this year's crop will be large enough to give one hundred apples to every man, woman and child in the country, and it will be better in quantity and quality than usual. The apple has been in historical evidence in ancient and modern times. The beautiful apples of to-day came from the little sour crab-apple carried at an early day from Rome to Britain, and transported to our Western Hemisphere in advanced stages of cultivation. The response it has made in color, size, durability and flavor to the intelligent culture of modern science in this country is simply marvelous. In olden times the apple was thus used as the symbol of beauty and love:

As the apple tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. (Cant. 2: 3.)

Penalty for Skimming Cream

ORDINARILY, there is no penalty for taking cream from the milk, but a reward that the housekeeper understands. But to take the cream from the milk and then sell the impoverished product as unskimmed milk is not only wrong but it is forbidden by law. A verdict of $16,800 was directed to be entered by Justice A. E. Gladding in the Supreme Court at Binghamton the other day in an action brought by the State of New York against a New York City milk dealer accused of skimming the cream from 168 cans of milk, and then selling to the public the article, claiming that it contained the cream. The penalty levied was $100 a can. The laws of all States are justly getting more and more strict against adulterated and impure foods. Milkmen, as a rule, have a high standard of integrity. There are some, however, who "doctor" milk spoiling or spoiled, and who, in their greed, take the cream from it before they sell their product. The hundreds of forms of little selfishness, the larger schemes of gain and graft, are the taking of the cream for self and the selling of the impoverished milk to neighbors at the price of both, imitating those saying:

When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn? and the Sabbath, that we may set forth wheat, making the ephah small, and the shekel great, and falsifying the balance by deceit? (Amos 8: 5.)

"MEKE-MEKE," A FIJIAN WAR-DANCE AT BAU

A TYPICAL FIJIAN VILLAGE ON THE REWA RIVER

A CANNIBAL VILLAGE TO-DAY

BY DR. ROBERT A. BACHMANN, U. S. N.

WHEN you come into the port of Suva, the largest city of the Fiji group of islands, the first real impression of the place will be given by a boat or two full of natives, tall, muscular and black, whose fuzzy thick hair has been trained to stand out from the head five or six inches like a huge, well-trimmed mop. Some have lighter hair than the others, almost a shade of reddish blond, contrasting strangely with their swarthy African complexion. This effect is much desired, and is obtained by plastering the scalp once a week with lime.

They will hold up a bunch of bananas or shout some picked-up English phrase at you, and grin, displaying usually thirty-two fine white teeth. About this time you will recollect the stories of cannibalism told about the inhabitants of Fiji, and wonder just how much truth there is in them.

Of course these stories all concern themselves with periods of time—fifteen and twenty years ago and longer. Everybody in Suva tells you that at the present time no cannibalism exists. It is difficult to obtain any trustworthy information that is at all complete. We told the consul this, and he said: "Well, why don't you go to Bau, the ancient capital of the islands, the residence of old Cacobau [pronounced Thakombau], and the former hotbed of all savage customs? Besides that, the trip up the Rewa River will interest you. I can make all necessary arrangements any time you like."

Now, the Fiji group consists of two main islands—Viti Levu and Vauna Levu—the city of Suva being located on the southern coast of the former. The population of Suva numbers one and a half thousand whites, chiefly English. Whatever your preconceived ideas of Fiji may have been, Suva will upset them. There is nothing primitive about it. The natives in the streets, after the first surprise of their strange hair wears off, look very tame and civilized. The streets are clean and well paved. There are several hotels, a cricket field, churches, a club, a race track, and a Carnegie library newly finished. The Suva Times prints all the cable news, and letters from complaining citizens, just like the press in any other British community. There are even department stores and a jail—I mean gaol—the landmarks of higher civilization. If you are looking for local color you must seek it outside of the Europeanized city of Suva. Even Cannibal Tom, an aged Fijian with a bad record and unkempt hair which gave him rather a wild appearance, was serving two weeks in jail for some trivial offense. So when the consul suggested the trip to Bau we accepted eagerly, and made preparations to start early the next morning.

On the way up the consul related some of the more authentic instances of cannibalism that had taken place in and about the region we were going to visit. In the village of Namena, he said, fifty bodies had been captured in 1851 from a neighboring tribe after a battle and cooked at a feast given to celebrate the victory. In 1867 the famous Baker massacre occurred. The Rev. Thomas Baker, a missionary, started to make a tour to some of the more interior of the native villages. On his way he stopped over night at Nasova, presenting a whale's tooth, much prized by the Fijians, to the chief, who accepted it, thus signifying his friendly intentions. The next morning, however, the chief formed Mr. Baker and his seven native Christians into single file, himself heading the column, and just as they reached the outskirts of the village a mob of natives in war-paint rushed upon them and killed all except two native Christians. The chief struck down Mr. Baker personally with an imported American steel hatchet. A great feast was held, and portions of the unfortunate missionary's body were sent, cooked, to the surrounding tribes. His head was kept by the chief, but several years later returned to the victim's family.

Although the old king Cacobau turned over his government to England in 1874, Bau never lost its name for being the center of learning, arbiter of language and seat of the royal family.

Tanoa, Cacobau's father and great-grandfather of the present Ratu, was one of the most villainous of all the kings who ruled in Bau. The history of his atrocities makes professional ogres like Nero and Catherine de Medici appear like martyred saints. At his death his son Cacobau, who succeeded him, strangled his father's five wives, his own mother among them, in accordance with the custom of the land. Later in life, Cacobau embraced the new lotu—Christianity. From the date of his conversion he committed no more outrages and discarded all of his wives save one whom he married with the church ceremony when both were baptized. His son Ratu Abel did not look very favorably upon the new religion, and mixed very little with foreigners, yet no charges of cannibalism or other cruelties were laid at his door. The present Ratu Kadavu is a well-educated man, and with his cousin Ratu Pope attended the University of Sydney.

"RATU" CACOBAU WITH WAR-CLUB

A number of natives came to greet us when we landed at Bau, among them a few whom the consul seemed to know. They volunteered to act as escorts for us, and by various expressions tried to convey the idea that they were glad to see us.

Bau looks beautiful enough at the present time, as most of the village is made up of no more than sixty or seventy grass huts clustered irregularly about a green or common. Cocoanut palms are interspersed among these huts as well as the mango, and the great shade-giving bread fruit tree. No attempt has been made to lay out streets, but paths wind about conveniently and take their place. On the hill overlooking the village on one side and the sea on the other, the bodies of Tanoa, Cacobau and their wives lie buried, marked by European tombstones of marble, inscribed with their names and the dates of their respective demises. A school forms one side of the square; across from this stands the council chamber, built on the trench where the bodies were roasted for their former feasts. The old headstone against which Cacobau used to dash the brains of his victims still stands and the anchor and rudder of a French ship wrecked near Bau lies beside it. The crew of this vessel was captured and held for quite a time. I asked the consul if they ultimately went the way of other prisoners, to which he replied laconically but very expressively, "Well, rather!"

We wandered around and about these grass shacks, talking to the women and getting them to pose for pictures. Most of the men were away in the fields, so the majority of the natives we encountered were women. The houses seemed cool enough inside, and it was a relief to enter one of them and stretch on the woven grass mats that cover the floor. The principal food of the people today consists of bananas, pineapples, papayas, yams, fish, baked bread fruit and taro root.

The consul had told us he would spread the luncheon we brought with us in Ratu Kadavu's dining-room, and invite him to join, as he was very fond of Europeans. Accordingly we went to Kadavu's house. This differed from the others only that it was made of wood instead of grass. It was not large and its single room was divided by partitions into a small dining-room, sitting-room and bed chamber. Strange contrasts were apparent at every turn, showing the curious mixture of primitive man and modern civilization. For instance, on the walls hung pictures of the various cricket teams to which Kadavu belongs, cheap prints of French paintings, and between these a set of whale's teeth of no intrinsic value, yet highly prized by the Fijians. Beside a copy of the treaty by which Great Britain assumed control of the island hangs a fierce war-club—the favorite weapon of old Cacobau. Beneath a picture of Queen Victoria I saw an old sword swinging. I examined it and found it was a French weapon, undoubtedly the arm of the unfortunate French vessel's commander. Our meal completed, we inscribed our names in the visitors' book, and went to see the Meke-Meke that had been prepared for us.

The dance began with every one sitting down, the musicians beating wooden drums to one side. Then, to a time not unlike American ragtime in rhythm, their bodies began to sway and twitch and their arms and hands described strange twists and curves. Presently they arose, formed the music in the center and danced with a peculiar loping step around it. All these muscular efforts were accomplished by a weird low chant. The figures executed by the men were quite intricate, and as they became filled with the enthusiasm of the performance the steps and leaps became faster and faster. Their voices now assumed a shrill pitch, and it could be plainly seen that nothing short of a delirium of motion would result. Finally the performers grew so excited and the music became so fast that all attempts at keeping time with the musicians or with each other were futile, and the dance resolved itself into a number of

A New Marksmanship Record

THE fall battle practice of the North Atlantic fleet took place this year in the latter part of October, and was witnessed by Secretary of the Navy Daniels, Secretary of Commerce Redfield, Secretary of War Garrison, and Assistant Secretary of the Navy Roosevelt. The official party was on board the battleship Wyoming, which established a new record for marksmanship in the American navy. Due to the policy of secrecy with which all nations guard their exact marksmanship records, there have been no details published of the event, but Secretary Daniels said after it was all over: "I regret that every American citizen could not have witnessed the performance of the ships both in maneuvers and in firing. They would have had their pride in the navy quickened, for they would have seen matchless precision and perfect discipline. No description of the practice could convey an impression of its thrilling interest or of its importance. It shows, as far as accuracy in gun firing is concerned, that the American navy is ready for any emergency.

The practice took the form of an actual engagement. The approach to the target was made from a distance of ten miles, and the firing began at a range of three and one-half miles. After twenty minutes of firing the targets still remained, though some of them were riddled by the shells from the big guns.

To Abandon Free-Toll Plan

REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM C. ADAMSON of Georgia, who was chairman of the House Committee on Inter-State and Foreign Commerce in the last Congress, and will be re-elected to that position when the House assembles for the regular session in December, announced a few days ago that he would introduce a resolution to suspend the provision of the Panama Canal act permitting coastwise vessels of American register to pass through the canal without payment of tolls. Recent reports that the President intended to recommend in his annual message to Congress that the free tolls provision should be repealed, have met with evasive answers in some official quarters and in others with statements that were construed as denials of the reports. This announcement clears away the mystery and makes it certain that the Wilson administration agrees that the granting of free tolls to American coastwise vessels was contrary to the letter and the spirit of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty which made possible the construction of the great isthmian waterway. The President, after conferring with John Bassett Moore, chancellor for the State Department, announced that he is convinced of the correctness of the British contention that free tolls for American shipping are a violation of the treaty obligations.

Theological Night School in New York

SIXTEEN young men, all of whom are looking forward to entering the ministry, began work a short time ago as students in a theological preparatory school in the North Baptist Church, West Eleventh Street, New York City. This, it is said, is the first theological night school in America. The founder is Rev. John R. Gunn, the new pastor of the North Church. He himself conducted the first classes, but anticipated having assistance within the near future.

Mr. Gunn is very careful to emphasize the fact that this school is in no way intended as a substitute for or to supplant regular theological institutions. He announced the intention of the school to be to encourage young men to enter the ministry by preparing them for entrance to regular theological schools. Mr. Gunn also said that he believed the school might advantageously be used as a testing ground. Many young men desire to enter the ministry, but are uncertain as to their qualifications for the service. This preparatory course will give an opportunity for such men to solve this problem for themselves. Later in the course the students will be given practical training in superintending Sunday schools and teaching Bible classes. The school meets three nights each week, and there is no charge for tuition.

Roosevelt Welcomed at Rio Janeiro

THERE was a suggestion of similarity to General Grant's triumphant tour in the reception given to ex-President Roosevelt upon his arrival at Rio Janeiro on October 21. When the steamer Vandyke entered the harbor a delegation, which included the United States ambassador to Brazil and the embassy staff, a representative of the Brazilian ministry of foreign affairs, the Brazilian military attaché at Washington, and representatives of the Historical Institute, went aboard to welcome the visitor. When the party disembarked, they were greeted by a military salute and bands playing the Brazilian and American national anthems. Marshal Hermes Fonseca, president of the republic, sent a special representative, as he was unable to be present, while all cabinet ministers of Brazil, the minister of Argentina, with the members of his legation, presidents of the Brazilian senate and chamber of deputies, a representative parliamentary committee, presidents of tribunals of the high court of justice, members of the municipal council headed by the mayor of Rio Janeiro, members of the diplomatic corps and many naval officers were present. A procession was formed and proceeded to a reception room in the naval arsenal. Here members of Colonel Roosevelt's party were introduced to leading officials, who, in turn, presented their colleagues to the colonel. After this ceremony Colonel Roosevelt was conducted to the Guanabara Palace, where he will reside during his stay in Brazil.

Twenty Killed in Train Wreck

ON THE afternoon of October 19, a special train, bearing 179 officers and men of the Thirty-ninth and One Hundred and Seventh United States Coast Artillery and the bands from Fort Morgan, Ala., and Fort Barrancas, Fla., plunged through a trestle near State Line, Miss. Twenty of the soldiers were killed and one hundred others were injured. The special train was bearing the troops from Mobile to Meridian, Miss., where they were to participate in a State fair. The wreck occurred at a point where the Buckatunna trestle is over sixty feet high. The engine passed over safely, but the tender and three coaches plunged to the bottom of the ravine. The cars were badly smashed and the work of recovering the bodies of the dead and releasing the injured took a long time, because of the entangled and twisted wreckage. Relief trains carrying physicians and nurses were sent immediately to the scene of the disaster, and the injured men were taken to Mobile, where they were rushed to the hospitals, or, in the case of the more slightly injured, to comfortable hotel quarters.

Cuba's Political Troubles

ONCE more Cuba is in the midst of strenuous political agitation. In consequence of the refusal of the Congress to convene in extraordinary session to consider a presidential message recommending a new foreign loan, President Menocal has appealed directly to the people. He says he has been compelled to adopt this course by reason of "the gravest confusion in public affairs produced by the lack of a quorum in both houses of Congress, whereby the working of all departments of the government has been paralyzed, and so that the people may understand the character of this most lamentable conflict and be prepared for what may result from it."

The necessity for the floating of a fifteen million dollar loan is blamed by the present administration upon the former Liberal government. The president does not state in his appeal what course he intends to pursue in case the houses of Congress persistently refuse to convene, but the tone of his manifesto makes it plain that he considers some drastic action to be imperative.

Beef from South Africa

ACCORDING to statements recently made in London the Chartered Company of South Africa has decided upon a great undertaking which will transform Rhodesia into one of the great beef-producing countries of the world. The full details of the scheme have not yet been made public, but the despatches state that a number of American firms are closely associated with the move, and predict that it will have very important effects on the whole of South Africa. The tract of land under discussion is known to contain millions of acres of excellent grazing land, and it is believed that it will be converted into ranches conducted on American lines. Branch railway lines will be run into the new country from the Cape-Cairo Railway when it is finished and it is calculated that meat can be gotten into the great markets of Europe seven days sooner from this source and over the proposed route than by sea from Argentina.

The Indian Who Signs Our Money

THERE is a new registrar of the United States treasury, and he is Mr. Gabe E. Parker, an Indian, or rather part Indian, from the Choctaw tribe of Oklahoma. Mr. Parker, who was sworn into office a few days ago, is shown in the accompanying photograph seated at his desk in the treasury. Underneath is a reproduction of his signature, which will during his tenure of office appear on the United States Government paper currency. Mr. Parker was appointed by President Wilson to fill this position, which heretofore has almost always been held by a negro, when it was learned that the appointment of another colored man would precipitate a long and wordy fight in the Senate. Mr. Parker, who is really only one-eighth Choctaw, resigned as superintendent of the Armstrong Indian School in Oklahoma to accept the treasury position.

New Bishops Elected at New York

THE General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, recently in session at New York, decided not to alter the name of the denomination at present. The discussion will doubtless be resumed at the next convention three years hence. The five new bishops elected at New York were the Rev. John P. Tyler, who becomes bishop of North Dakota, succeeding Bishop Mann, who is transferred to Southern Florida to succeed Bishop Gray; Dr. W. T. Capers, who becomes bishop of Spokane, succeeding Bishop Wells; Dr. Milo H. Gates, who becomes bishop of Cuba; Rev. F. B. Howden, who becomes bishop of New Mexico; Dean Charles Blaney Colmore, who becomes bishop of Porto Rico.

MISSIONARY HARDSHIPS IN CHINA

DURING the last great famine in China, as many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may probably remember, the city of Tsingkiangpu, which has been the headquarters of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD China orphan work for a number of years, was a center of distress. From all sections for many miles around, long processions of starving men and women, accompanied by children, came to Tsingkiangpu in the hope of getting relief. At one time, in the height of the distress, it was estimated that there were over seventy thousand of these refugees camping outside of the city walls.

DESTITUTE NATIVES APPEALING FOR FOOD AT THE TSINGKIANGPU MISSION

Those scenes are only a memory of the past, yet within the last few months they have been vividly recalled. Missionary George D. Schlosser of the Free Methodist Mission in Tsingkiangpu has sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a number of photographs taken recently, which show that Tsingkiangpu has once more become a city of refuge. For over a year the country has been practically in a state of war, although the rebellion proper ceased with the establishment of the republic. Famine conditions have prevailed in many sections, and at one time not long ago there were as many as six thousand people fed daily at Tsingkiangpu, the Protestant missionaries doing their full share of the work. One of the photographs shows a group of women coming to the "roof-house" of the Mission for food. The portion given to each was about half a pound of rice daily, which, boiled until fully swelled, was sufficient to prevent starvation. Missionary Schlosser writes that during the last winter women came regularly to the mission "roof-house" for their daily rations and that there have been at all times lately a few thousand destitute persons around the city.

The population of Tsingkiangpu is about 250,000. In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Orphanage there, a considerable number of boys and girls are clothed, fed and educated by the generosity of our readers. Some of the orphans are seen in the photographs on this page. These are bright children, active, docile, and full of promise. The missionary sent other photographs which our space limitations do not permit to appear here, showing how these little ones looked when they first came to the orphanage. One depicts a little girl clothed in rags, tied together with strings. Such has been the transformation that no one would know her now. She is, however, in one of the groups which we print, and is ranked among the brightest of all the girls in the orphanage.

Another picture shown by Mr. Schlosser was that of a group of about thirty children—boys and girls—a little, raggedy company—all of whom are now happy pupils in the orphanage.

"Our difficulties here are many," writes Mr. Schlosser, "and the laborers are few; but we have the blessing of the Lord with us in the work. The results of the present war have distressed us somewhat at our station; but still we see the hand of God in protecting the place during the weeks while we were compelled to leave and go to the mountains."

These children have all been taught to know the names of their kind patrons in America, and to love them. As in other missions, however, there are several who are unprovided with patrons. This affords for any reader a share in this soul and body saving work among the orphans of China. A postal to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will bring all necessary information.

Brigandage continues in many sections, especially in the interior provinces. A force of brigands commanded by General Hwang Liang is reported to have murdered three hundred people in the province of Fokien, and also burned two mission churches, believed to be the property of American missionary societies. The American missionaries from the disturbed districts are still in Fuchow, where they took refuge during the recent troubles.

The Chinese Government troops sent against the brigands have not shown much activity, but the Chinese war office has promised the American chargé d'affaires, Edward T. Williams, that it would institute effective measures looking to the suppression of the brigands.

EX-GOVERNOR SULZER NOT OUT OF PUBLIC LIFE

WILLIAM SULZER, the impeached and discredited governor of the State of New York, is laying plans to make the race for assemblyman from the Sixth District of New York County. Mr. Sulzer has stated that he will accept the Progressive nomination which was tendered him on a unanimous vote of the committee on vacancies, despite the opposition of both the State and county chairmen of the Progressive party. Within two days after his impeachment, he was petitioned by a large body of voters in the Sixth District to run as a candidate for the Assembly. Mr. Sulzer's reply to the petition was as follows: "In view of urgent pleadings from lifelong friends, and the request in writing from more than half of the registered voters of the Sixth Assembly District, regardless of party affiliations, begging me to accept the nomination for member of assembly to further the cause of honest government, I have consented to come back to Albany as a member of the Assembly for the good that I can do.

"Of course, I appreciate the confidence of some of my old constituents, and no words of mine can tell them how grateful I am for their undiminished support and unwavering loyalty at this time."

"At first the governor was inclined to refuse this nomination," said his secretary, "notwithstanding the fact that it came to him in such a non-partisan manner, because Mrs. Sulzer wanted him to get out of politics forever and take a long rest. Several committees of prominent citizens from the Sixth Assembly District have been to Albany urging the governor to take the nomination.

"The rabbis of every synagogue in the Sixth Assembly District and a number of old friends and neighbors of the governor, representing the various parties, called at the Executive Mansion and pleaded with Mr. and Mrs. Sulzer for over two hours. They presented him with a petition signed by more than 3,800 names of registered voters in the Sixth Assembly District out of a registration of 5,700, pledging him their loyal support."

Mr. Sulzer journeyed to New York shortly after his removal from office for the purpose of conferring with political leaders on his prospect for success.

There has been some talk of Mr. Sulzer's going upon the lecture platform. Through close personal friends it was learned that he had received offers for a season of lectures, ranging from $10,000 to nearly $100,000. The ex-governor has been favorably impressed by these offers and by the consideration that there is no time like the present for him to command audiences before which he might expound his political convictions.

That Mr. Sulzer is not without a large and perhaps influential personal following was evinced by the gathering at the Executive Mansion on the evening of October 19 of a large group of men, who presented to him a loving cup. One of the newspaper accounts of the event closed with the statement that "while Mr. Sulzer appreciated the spirit of the gathering, he was somewhat vexed because one of his admirers carried off his familiar black slouch campaign hat. The man who got the hat, and who, by the way, is well known in Brooklyn, proudly displayed the headgear to friends on the following day and declared that nothing could induce him to part with it."

Martin H. Glynn, who has been acting as governor of New York State for two months, was sworn in on October 17, immediately after the decision of the Court of Impeachment was promulgated.

REDISCOVERED COSTA RICA

BY CHARLES M. PEPPER

A GOOD many Americans have just discovered Costa Rica and its pretty little capital of San José, which lies in the bowl of the mountains. Since people began going down to Panama they have found that it is quite easy to learn something about Panama's neighbors, and Costa Rica is the nearest of these. It is one night's voyage by steamer from Colon to Port Limon, and then a few hours up over a wonderful mountain railway through luxuriant tropical vegetation. So Americans are coming up as a side trip to their visits to the Canal.

I have known Costa Rica for ten or twelve years, and yet I share the pleasure of the tourists in their first experience in riding through the clouds. I also note in visits, at intervals of several years apart, how the cultivation of the banana is growing and spreading. It is not likely that Costa Rica will become solely a great banana plantation as some one has said, because the banana lands are mostly in the lowlands. Though irrigation is resorted to, the low coast lands are, nevertheless, bound to be the most important section for banana production. The banana is planted also to help protect young coffee trees, and this sometimes causes the idea of banana plantations in the highlands. But coffee is the crop for the highlands, and Costa Rican coffee has a flavor of its own that causes it to command a very high price in the markets of the world. There are some beautiful coffee plantations in the country surrounding San José. Still, the banana is the greatest source of wealth, and the export tax on bananas is an important source of revenue to the government.

In the trip up the other day, a traveling companion remarked that he saw faces such as he had seen in Egypt. He meant the native Indians. I do not know whether ethnologists have figured out any connection between the ancient Egyptians and the native races of Central America, but one notes many faces of a distinctive Egyptian type. There are still some aboriginal Indians in the country, though the mass of the aboriginal race became intermixed with the Spaniards who came to Costa Rica centuries ago. These primitive Indians are yet found in the river country, but they shrink from contact with civilization. One of the officials of the big fruit company which has done so much to develop Costa Rica told me that in the forest region along the rivers these primitive Indians were still to be met with, and, occasionally, can be hired for work in clearing lands. But as banana civilization advances, they retreat farther and farther into the wilds.

Taking the country generally, the laboring classes, or peons, are about two-thirds pure Indian. They are industrious, and very many of them are landowners in a small way. Costa Rica, in fact, has a very large number of small landowners. That is one cause of the stability of the government, for revolutions so common elsewhere in Latin-America, and especially in some of the neighboring Central American republics, are unknown in Costa Rica. As in the United States, they have plenty of excitement during an electoral campaign, but when the election is held, all parties abide by the result.

THE TROPHY OF A HUNT IN COSTA RICA

At the present time an election is in progress in Costa Rica and, while it has some features not agreeable to Americans, one is struck by the absence of vituperation or personalities. There used to be an American colony here which was not very desirable. This was before an extradition treaty was concluded between the United States and Costa Rica, under which fugitives from justice in the United States could be returned for trial. All that is changed now, and the Americans who are here are reputable people, closely identified with the development of the country.

For those who like the open air life I know no better place than the highlands of Costa Rica. A young man who came down from one of our big cities had been reading many articles about the importance of city people getting back to the farm. It had never made much impression on him, he said, but when he came down here he had a different feeling and announced that he intended to find a position on one of the banana plantations or on a ranch. Open air life in the tropics appeals to him more than it did in the temperate zone.

Half an hour's ride on the railway from San José is Cartago, which is noted for its mineral waters and is said to be the most delightful place of residence in Central America. San José is pretty well up in the mountains, 4,000 feet; at Cartago it is a thousand feet higher. It is here that the Central American Court of Arbitration, for which Andrew Carnegie a few years ago gave a permanent home, is located. An earthquake, which caused the loss of several hundred lives, destroyed this edifice, but a new one has been provided by Mr. Carnegie. The purpose of this court of arbitration is to settle the disputes of the various Central American countries. In this respect it has a wide field of usefulness, for they have many disputes among themselves.

PLANNING A GREAT MEMORIAL

"ONE hundred or more prominent citizens of New York have already expressed their willingness to take part in a movement to erect a memorial in honor of the late General Booth, founder of the Salvation Army. As that memorial can most fittingly be made by strengthening the army's work, it has been decided that a college be erected for the training of its officers."

In this way the Hon. Seth Low opened the meeting at the Hotel McAlpin, when plans for the collection of a half million dollars to be devoted to the erection of a training college in memory of the late General Booth were agreed upon.

Miss Evangeline Booth, commander of the forces of the Salvation Army in the United States, delivered an address. She said her father always declared himself opposed to the erection of any monument to his memory which could not be made to serve a practical and useful purpose.

"It is thought that nothing will so well meet my father's ideals and his expressed wishes as that this memorial shall take the form of a large institution, where our officers can be more thoroughly equipped, instructed and trained to fill their respective posts in the various branches of our work," said Miss Booth. She explained that the army has now twenty-nine colleges in different parts of the world. Two are situated in the United States, one in New York and one in Chicago. She declared these to be totally inadequate, and that the army must, if it wishes more fully to realize its mission in America, be better equipped with educational institutions. The supply of workers, the commander said, is far below the demand, and the work is greatly retarded by the lack of trained men and women.

Miss Booth declared that her father never belittled learning, slighted culture, or despised profundity. But he realized that he had a great mission to perform in life and only a brief time to do it, hence the preparation of a learned and cultured ministry would have to be left to another generation.

"Of course, the vital requirement of every worker in the Salvation Army is that he or she recognize the deity of Christ and live according to his directions. Then there will be required of the candidate a certificate of health from an unimpeachable authority. Following this the candidate will be obliged to satisfy the Salvation Army authorities that he has obtained at least a limited education in the schools. When these conditions have been met, the army will take him in hand. The candidate will be carefully studied with a view to determining just what field he is best fitted for. If it should develop that in the judgment of his superior officers he would accomplish better results in the industrial than in any other department, he will be especially trained for that branch of the service."

Recently commissions were handed to sixty-four cadets by Commander Eva Booth. Colonel John Dean, the principal of the training school, said that with more extended accommodations he could have graduated a much larger class. He lacked both in physical equipment and instruction. "I was obliged to work myself almost to the point of complete exhaustion," said Colonel Dean. "I delivered about twice as many lectures as would be required of a man in my position under normal conditions. Not only that, our students were obliged to 'cram' to a painful degree. When the new college is in operation, we propose to extend the term and take matters more easily and more naturally. But with every section of the country crying, 'Give us workers, give us workers,' we are obliged to hurry through."

So insistent was the demand for officers this year that these more than sixty graduates were rushed to their respective fields as soon as their diplomas were granted. They were given no time for physical recuperation after their strenuous studies.

FROM FIRE AND WRECK

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

SOMETIMES the little troubles loom before one like veritable mountains—sometimes the tiniest raindrops look like great, splashy silver dollars, and sometimes, O friends of mine, you feel that you are very unfortunate and that romance is dead, and life itself is scarcely worth the living! It was on such a day that I started out from the CHRISTIAN HERALD offices for a talk with two Volturno survivors.

The rain, horrid, extraordinarily wet rain, flew all around me as I went down to a not very attractive quarter of town. For I was bound in the direction of the Clara de Hirsch Home for Immigrant Girls on Second Avenue. And the dark, gloomy aspect did not make me any more cheerful. I was still the most unhappy girl in the United States. Then I realized with a start that I had arrived at my destination.

I rang the bell at a dark basement entrance, and a smiling little girl opened the door for me. When I told her my object in coming, she requested me to "please be sea-ted and pres-ently the girls should to arrive." So I waited until the door opened and two young women stepped in. They had lost friends, clothes, almost their lives, and they were strangers in a strange land. But they smiled at me! I felt just a tiny bit ashamed.

The girls were rather attractive peasants from Poland. Their cheeks were rosy and their eyes were clear. They were comfortably dressed in coarse woolen frocks and their hair was neatly combed. In fact, they showed very few signs of the terrible tragedy through which they had just come.

"How do you do?" I said politely—it is always hard to rise above banalities—but to my surprise I received no reply. The little smiling girl came to my rescue.

"Please, miss," she announced, "they are Polish. They spik no American."

I gasped. Then all at once I had a small inspiration. "Can we have an interpreter?" I asked.

Quickly an interpreter appeared, rising like some genie from the dark of a gloomy looking doorway. It was a young man with intelligent brown eyes and a rather pleasant voice.

"Ma'am," he murmured with a deep accent, "I spik the Polish and your language. Ask of them some questions!"

I searched a moment for a good beginning, then,

"Ask them," I hurried, "ask them when they first knew of the fire!"

The young man turned to the girls and fired a question at them in a rather musical tongue. The oldest girl answered. Her eyes dilated and her rosy cheeks paled a little, while her hands trembled as she gestured with them. After a moment the man turned in my direction.

"She says," he told me, "that they knew nothing about the fire until six o'clock in the morning. Then a cry was 'Raise! Fire! Fire!' They rush up on deck without their dresses or bed quilts. They find smoke—smoke everywhere! And sometimes they see a little red flame shoot out. The deck is very hot to their feet." He was gesticulating wildly, and the girls were watching him out of wide, horror-filled eyes.

"Did they see any of their friends?" I asked next, and in a few minutes, after a shrill exchange of very excited words, the young man again turned to me.

"One woman they know," he answered, "was kneeling on the burning deck. She was praying. Another woman stood by the rail with her three small babies, frantic, knowing not what she do. She throw them overboard in hopes to save them. They fall into the sea. . . . The black waves swallow them." He paused impressively, his hands making a wide, downward sweep. The girls, watching him closely, began to cry—very softly. After a moment he continued: "The sea cover the babies. Suddenly the woman realize what she do!

"'O God,' she cry, 'what cause me to do this? How can I live without my children?'

"And she, too, throw herself over the railing—a wave dash over her—she is gone."

There was a mist before my eyes, and I brushed it away quickly. But the man, eager-faced, was waiting for his next question.

"How—in what way—did they leave the ship?" I managed to gasp.

It was the smaller of the two that answered my question. Her great eyes flashed with excitement as she talked to the interpreter. He was smiling broadly when he spoke to me.

"They slid down a rope," he chuckled, "a slipper' rope. And it take them to a boat—a small boat that bob like a cork on the high waves. They are scared and they pray for help. All around them the sea is bright from the flames. The air is filled with screams. Soon they reach the big boat—it is the Kroonland." He paused again, and again I put in a question.

"How did they like it—the other boat?"

The man did not question the girls. Instead, he answered directly:

"Ah, miss," he said, "that I know, for they have tell me. The people of the large boat were—how you say it?—very kind to them, but the girls say this when I ask them, 'It was a nice boat, and the people they were nice, but no matter how nice they are we do not go again to cross the ocean. For the sea is deep, and the waves are high, an' there is much fear in our hearts.' Me, I do not blame them."

After a while, when I got up to go, I silently offered my hand to the two girls. They as silently stepped forward and shyly nodded to me, and then suddenly one of the girls darted forward and whispered to the young man.

He listened attentively for a moment and then turned to me.

"She say," he murmured, "to tell you that her young man was on the boat. She have not heard from him, whether he live or die. She say to tell you his name and to ask you if you should see him to let her know. For she is anxious!"

I went out again into the rain.

Oh, girls, when we go over our silly little troubles, that are so very tiny, and commonplace, and artificial, let us remember the very real troubles that some other girls have. And let us thank God, with every living breath, that we have not been exposed to the danger of fire and storm, and the angry sea.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—EVANGELIST GIPSY SMITH has been conducting a series of Gospel meetings at Danville, Va., in a tabernacle capable of seating 3,000 people. Singing Evangelist Benjamin F. Butts, who was in charge of the music, organized a volunteer choir of five hundred voices which did effective work.

—THROUGH MRS. EVANS, a missionary reader of this journal, five little Indian children at Anvik, Alaska, have forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a contribution of fourteen pennies for the Lincoln monument. The gift has been sent to the Lincoln Highway Association through the kindness of Mr. Ewing Galloway, New York City.

—THE FOURTH ANNIVERSARY of Galilee Temple, at Rockland, Me., was celebrated recently with appropriate exercises. This is a union church, founded by Rev. E. S. Ufford, author of the famous hymn "Throw Out the Life-line," who is still the pastor. Mr. Ufford, in his evangelistic work, frequently uses for illustration a United States life-line which has saved the lives of seven sailors.

—ANY READER of this journal who would be interested in helping a struggling little church in Florida can find a worthy cause by writing to the pastor, Rev. C. B. Wetherell, Orlando, Fla., who will answer all inquiries. A crisis has arrived in the affairs of the little church, which has been doing excellent work since it was started and deserves to be helped.

—NEW YORK'S oldest hotel is the square-rigged ship Jacob A. Stander, whose guests consist of sixty working girls and eighteen workingmen, who pay nominal sums each for room and board per week. This philanthropy was established by the late John Arbuckle, the "coffee king." A notice was posted on the boat recently, announcing that all rooms must be vacated; but the urgent petition of the beneficiaries for a continuance of their home was granted and the good work will be continued.

—DURING THE PHENOMENAL rainfall on October 1, the dispensary attached to the Williamsburg Mission to the Jews was flooded to such an extent that drugs, instruments, and general equipment were swept away, boiler-rooms dismantled, ceilings broken and the entire establishment temporarily put out of commission. A thousand dollars will hardly repair the mission's loss. Meanwhile from fifty to eighty poor patients have to be turned away on account of the hospital being out of commission.

—MANY NEW LEADERS and teachers of mission study classes were inspired and instructed during the conferences held this season under the direction of the Missionary Education Movement. Scores of classes are being organized to study the two themes which were the chief subjects for consideration at these conferences, the Foreigner in the United States, and Conditions and Opportunities in the New Republic of China. Ten-day conferences were held at Blue Ridge, N. C.; Silver Bay, Lake George, N. Y., and at Lake Geneva, Wis.

—REV. LEON C. HILLS, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Cheyenne, Wyo., last summer introduced an innovation in religious services in the West. This was a special Sunday afternoon meeting for automobile parties. Nearly all the surrounding towns were represented, and there was quite a gathering of ranchmen. An orchestra and choir from Cheyenne furnished the music. The service was held in a natural amphitheater in the shadow of Ames monument, on the very crest of the mountain. Here the transcontinental highway crosses the Divide. Mr. Hills took for his text Matt. 5: 1, "And seeing the multitudes, he went up into a mountain." The minister drew a beautiful lesson from this text, and showed that a preacher of the Gospel can accomplish much more sometimes by going to his flock, instead of waiting for the flock to come and hear him. He spoke of the power for good of the automobile, and took issue with those religious people who look upon the automobile as a creation of the devil. "I rejoice when I see a churchman purchase an automobile," said the minister, "for I say 'here is a chance for greater good in building up Christ's kingdom of righteousness.'"

—A CORRESPONDENT FROM Alabama sends a clipping from a newspaper in which Mr. Perry T. Parish, of Nashville, Ga., makes an appeal for friendly letters. He is blind and bedridden; has been a sufferer from rheumatism for twenty-five years, has been confined to his bed for sixteen years, and blind for thirteen years. Mr. Parish is still a young man, only twenty-eight. He particularly asks the boys and girls to write him. He says: "I do enjoy getting letters, even if I can't see to read them. My brother (who is on crutches) reads my letters and does my writing for me." Address him, "R. F. D., No. 2, Nashville, Ga."

—A NEW BAPTIST CHURCH, costing $32,850, was recently dedicated at Jollice, Tenn. It is a modern church with all conveniences for every department of church life. There are twenty-two Sunday school rooms, church auditorium, Sunday school auditorium, secretary's office, basement, kitchen, etc. This church a few years ago was small, and gave for all purposes only fifty odd dollars. The town was one of the most lawless and immoral in the mountains. The saloons are gone, religion and education are dominant in the life of the town. The church people believe that happiness and prosperity have come to stay. The church has given over $1,200 for missions this year, while raising thousands for the new building. Rev. J. E. Martin is the pastor.

Make Your Crisco Fruit Cake Now

A fruit cake must be rich. It can be more digestible. It will be both if made with Crisco. As Crisco does not turn rancid, but remains sweet and fresh, so does the Crisco fruit cake made in November taste just as delicious—or more so, on New Year's day.

Questions and Answers

A Texas Reader. What further step should a mother take in striving to convince her husband and children of their need of salvation than godly living and daily warning of the results of a life of sin? As yet none of them have surrendered their hearts to God, after ten years of godly counsel. They continue to mock and reject, claiming that their home has been made unhappy because of their mother's consecrated life. The mother is not allowed her church dues; must always walk to church; is forbidden to contribute to any charitable cause. Husband and children cultivate a false pride, are haughty and indifferent to the poor for whom Jesus died. What step should the mother take next?

This truly is a sad picture of a divided home. If the mother is sure that her spirit is truly humble, and if she is patient and gentle throughout the duties of home life, there would seem to be nothing to do except to continue her efforts, with faith and prayer. Perhaps she needs the apostle's injunction: "Be not weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not." The mother should, however, try as far as possible to keep her religious life from being offensive to the other members of the home. We do not mean at all that she should make any compromises. But in all the innocent details of home life she should enter helpfully and cheerfully into the interests of the other members of the family, and do all she can to make the home atmosphere one of cheer, not of strife and gloom. As to the warnings, while it is truly necessary to warn the unsaved, it is possible to warn so continuously that the warning shall lose something of its effect. The Master said we were to become "fishers of men." And fishermen must have tact and skill as well as determination and perseverance. Keep in the closest possible touch with the Master; study his Word and follow his example: faith and love and gentleness will triumph.

M. C., Burley, Idaho. The greeting in Luke 10: 5 was the ancient form of salutation in the East and prevails unto this day. "But from the lips of Christ and his messengers," writes a commentator, "it meant something far higher, both in the gift and the giving of it, than the current greeting." It meant the spiritual peace which is the gift of God through Jesus Christ. There are many homes in our own land to-day in which such a salutation from the lips of Christian friends would not be regarded as out of place but would be welcomed.

S. J. H., Whitehall, Md. Robert Raikes, an English philanthropist, founded the modern Sunday school in Gloucester, England, in 1784. In 1786, Thos. Crenshaw, of Hanover County, Virginia, established a Sunday school in his district. The Methodist Church, at a conference in Charleston, S. C., in 1790, took up the work formally, which afterward spread to other denominations. It is claimed that for more than thirty years prior to the Sunday school of Raikes, John Wesley had been in the habit of assembling children in England for the purpose of religious instruction, and he recorded in his journal (July 18, 1784) that he found Sunday schools springing up wherever he went.

Reader, Chippewa Falls, Minn. 1. The poem you mention is not in our collection. 2. Matt. 24: 34 is explained by commentators to mean that, according to the usual way of speaking in prophecy, the generation then existing "would not pass away without seeing the beginning of the fulfilment of the prediction." Many of our Lord's prophetic utterances have a two-fold interpretation—a vision of events near at hand and of others still remote, yet both having a distinct relation to the fulfilment of the prophecy. Thus, as a leading commentator remarks, "either the whole of this prophecy was fulfilled in the destruction accomplished by Titus, as many hold; or, according to others, in the thorough dispersion of the Jews afterward under Adrian, in which every requirement of our Lord's words seems to be met."

Mrs. H. F. F., Walnut, Ill. 1. For complete information concerning the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD since its foundation thirty-five years ago, see last week's issue with historical supplement. 2. Patrick's birthplace is a matter of debate, although in his "Confession" he wrote that he had for his father "Calpurnius, a deacon, son of Potitus, a presbyter, who dwelt in the village of Bannavem Taberniæ." At sixteen he "did not know the true God" and he "was taken to Ireland in captivity" with many others. Scholars are almost unanimous in placing Bannavem Taberniæ in the neighborhood of Dumbarton on the river Clyde. He was converted in captivity, and after returning home went again to Ireland, this time as a missionary, and accomplished a great work among the people there. The time of his birth is uncertain, but was probably somewhere between 373 and 396. Early Christianity had already reached the British isles, parts of which, as one historian writes, "though not reached by the Romans were subjugated to Christ." The Christianity of those days was not that of the Roman Church but of the early Christian Church, akin to that of the churches founded by Paul and his fellow apostles. Eusebius believed the Britons were converted as early as the apostolic age and several other writers make a similar assertion. One historian concludes that "the first preachers of the Gospel in Britain did not so much as touch at Rome or receive any command or commission from that quarter to convert Britain." These facts furnish a clue to the simple character of Christianity there in the days of Patrick.

E. L. J., Ilion, N. Y. I have been accustomed to attend church and Sabbath school, and have also been a worker for missions. I am now deaf and do not go to church. Sometimes I feel I ought to go to church for example if nothing more. What do you think?

You are right in thinking that you ought to go to church for the sake of example, even if you cannot hear the service and the sermon. Your faithfulness will help others, particularly those who know your condition. They will realize that if you are faithful with this handicap, their obligation to be faithful is even greater. Then, too, you will doubtless receive a blessing in your own soul. The presence and blessing of God are not confined to words. When his Spirit comes to bless his people you will surely not be left out. Further, the hour in church may be a time of private devotion, meditation and communion with the Saviour which will be most helpful. Perhaps, however, your pastor could arrange to have one of the modern devices for the deaf installed, as has been done in many churches. Your other question will be answered in a future issue.

I. E., Munsonville, N. H. 1 Kings 22 relates the tragic story of the fate of Ahab, the wicked Israelitish monarch, who in addition to his idolatrous advisers had surrounded himself with a number of "false" prophets, presumably those who had conformed to the symbolical calf-worship of Jehovah. They were time-serving hypocrites, and when the king inquired of them regarding his contemplated war with Syria they spoke the things that pleased his ear and flattered his vanity. Micaiah, a true prophet of God, who had been imprisoned because of his fearless rebuke of the king, was brought out before Ahab and Jehosaphat, but he refused to be cajoled into flattering the king as the other prophets had done. In his first deliverance, Micaiah repeated in derision the words of the false prophets, but when Ahab, stung by his evident mockery, adjured him to speak "that which is true in the name of the Lord," the prophet spoke his message fearlessly (see verse 17), foreshadowing the defeat of Israel and the death of Ahab. The language in verses 19-23 is in line with belief concerning good and bad spirits, current among the Jews from the earliest days down to the Babylonish captivity.

C. J. S., Newark, N. J. Please tell me if the following expressions are correct: (1) "It wants water in that kettle;" (2) "What is the matter of your hand?" (3) "Mr. Smith made $2,000 off his farm."

(1) No. Correct form: "That kettle needs water." (2) No. Correct form: "What is the matter with your hand?" (3) No. Correct form: "Mr. Smith made $2,000 from his farm."

Mrs. A. B., Arena, Wis. The progenitors of the North American Indians are a puzzle to ethnologists. Some hold that they are of Malay, Mongol or Tartar stock, traceable to some far-off, prehistoric migration; and others point to the fact that over 100 words known to have been in use among the tribes at an early date are found in the languages of Asia and Australia and a lesser number in the languages of Europe and Africa as making an actual determination of the case impossible. Among the Aztecs and the early Mexicans and Peruvians, traces have been found pointing to an early civilization like that of the Chinese and Japanese. The probability is that the earliest races on this continent were the result of several migrations.

Mrs. E. M. D., Armington, Ill. Are we to understand from I. Cor. 8: 7-11 that it is a sin to do what one considers wrong although there is no wrong about it?

Precisely. That is exactly Paul's teaching, as he particularly outlines and emphasizes it in Rom. 14, I Cor. 8 and I Cor. 10: 23-33. He said himself that he did not consider it wrong to eat meat which might have been offered to idols (I Cor. 8: 4, 8; I Cor. 10: 25, 27), but that if he knew of any one who might be offended by his doing so he would eat no meat at all (I Cor. 8: 13). In Rom. 14: 20 he says: "All things indeed are pure, but it is evil for that man who eateth with offense"—that is, for the man who eats even though it troubles his conscience. The same thought is in Rom. 14: 23: "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." But our reason bears out this New Testament teaching; we know that it is wrong for a man to do something which he believes to be wrong. The whole spirit of the New Testament is away from legalism and toward a spontaneous, affectionate eagerness to please God and serve our neighbor. Where no command or prohibition is specified, each Christian is left free to follow his own enlightened conscience. To violate this is sin.

M. R., Dennison, Minn. What blood relation was Abraham to Rebekah, Isaac's wife?

He was her great-uncle. She was the daughter of Bethuel, who was the son of Nahor, Abraham's brother.

J. E. A., New York City. The "land of Nod" to which Cain went after the death of Abel, is interpreted as meaning literally, the "land of exile" or "wandering." At this time, as commentators hold, the population must have grown considerably. Jewish tradition gives the name of Cain's wife as Save. She was probably a relative who accompanied him in his flight. She may have been a daughter of Adam or of some one of his many sons (see Gen. 5: 4). Mankind was not yet developed into separate families and there was no law against intermarriage of relations until long afterward.

Mrs. E. S. B., Pasadena, Calif. Kindly give the correct pronunciation of Punjab.

The "u" has the sound of "u" in but; the "a" the sound of "a" in father.

E. S. D., Chicago, Ill. Ex. 33: 11 is a passage which has been much discussed; but when we read further on in the same chapter, the difficulty would seem to be explained. "Face to face" (verse 11) is interpreted by commentators as meaning freely, directly and not through the medium of an angel or in visions or dreams, as to the prophets. Verses 9 to 11 are an introduction to and a summary of events related more fully in verses 12-23. At each successive step of this wonderful experience, Moses longed for a fuller impression of the divine glory. The answer to his request in verse 20, and the language of the three following verses, must be considered in their relation to verse 11.

W. H. C., Ogdensburg, N. Y. Jer. 48: 47 promises restoration even to Moab for the sake of Lot, their righteous progenitor (see Gen. 19: 37). Similar promises were made to Egypt (see Jer. 46: 26), to Ammon (Jer. 49: 6) and to Elam (Jer. 49: 39) these promises being interpreted as signifying that Gospel blessings, temporal and spiritual, would be extended to the Gentiles in the last days. In Jer. 49: 2, the last clause of the verse might be rendered: "Shall possess those who possessed him."

A. R., New Florence, Pa. In Gen. 20: 12 Abram speaks of Sarai as his half-sister, the daughter of the same father, but not the same mother. The common Jewish tradition referred to by Josephus (Antiquities 1, 6, 6) and also by Jerome, is that Sarai was identical with Iscah (see Gen. 11: 29) daughter of Haran and sister of Lot, who is called Abraham's "brother."

N. B. B., Toledo, Ohio. Mr. Roosevelt's phrase, "We are come to Armageddon to battle for the Lord," was not used in a religious, but rather in a political sense. Like many other public men, he drew his oratorical illustration from the Scriptures. 'Armageddon, variously translated as "the mountain of destruction" and "the mountain of the Gospel," is the prophetical scene of the last great struggle between the forces of right and wrong.

A. Q., Phoenix, Ariz. According to the American Bible Society, the Bible, in whole or in part, is now printed in between 400 and 500 languages and dialects. In many instances the missionaries have done heroic work in Bible translation, some of them having to deal with tribes whose language was crude and unformed. In several parts of Africa, work of this character had to be done, and also in the islands of the Pacific during pioneer missionary times.

THE ENDLESS LIFE*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

AS WE suggested when the birth of Moses was the lesson, so now when we are to study his death, we suggest again that at least two other passages should be read as a part of the story: Moses' return, with Elijah, to this world at the earthly coronation of Christ as an ambassador from the court of heaven (Matt. 17), and John's vision of the redeemed host of heaven, singing "the song of Moses and the Lamb" (Rev. 15: 3), by which God shows us that Moses was the greatest of human characters, the nearest of humans to Christ, with whom his name is thus linked. Of all great men, therefore, his life is worthiest of careful study as showing the high possibilities of our humanity in goodness and usefulness. We may not have all his gifts, but we may have all his graces.

It is usual to study his life in three periods of forty years each; the first forty being occupied with his preparation for his life work in his home, and in the palace and schools of Egypt; the second with his preparation as a shepherd in Midian in daily fellowship with God; the third, with his leadership of Israel as their prophet, lawgiver and general. But there is another period in his life, as in every life, that is longest of all, and grandest of all when this life has been a good one, the after-death period of immortality in heaven and immortal influence on earth. When Moses disappeared from earth he was one hundred and twenty years old; when he came back from heaven at Christ's transfiguration he was 1,527 years young; when John heard "the song of Moses and the Lamb" he was 1,593, and he is now 3,408. Let us go on counting the birthdays of the good as a yearly reminder of immortality.

Viewing all the life and influence of Moses from his lowly birth down to this day when all the world knows and honors him and is uplifted by his life and by his words, let us consider the chief lessons to be learned by the particular class of boys or girls or men or women with which any one of us is connected as teacher or member. Here are some to choose from, which relate most directly to his death and what has been added to his biography since then: 1. The forgiven sins of a man predominantly good may shorten his life and abridge his usefulness (Num. 20: 1-13). 2. God counts death an event of importance (see Golden Text). 3. Personal, conscious life does not end with physical death (Matt. 17). 4. A human life is immortal on earth also in influence (Hos. 12: 13; Jer. 15: 1; Ps. 106: 23; Acts 7: 20-44; Luke 20: 37; Heb. 3: 2, 5; 11: 24-27). 5. The highest honors of heaven go to those who have lived the most unselfish and most useful lives.

"This is the land which I gave unto Abraham." To understand the dying vision of Moses, we must go back to that other "man of vision," greatest of his predecessors, the father of his country, Abraham, who left his own idolatrous land at the call of God to found a new nation that should bless the world. Just when he had given to Lot for the sake of peace what seemed the best part of the land (Gen. 13: 14), God bade him look east and west and north and south from the hills above Jericho on the west (as Moses in our lesson looked from the hills above Jericho on the east) and gave him a divine title deed to all he could see and more though it was mostly occupied then and would be occupied for centuries by warlike pagan tribes. Abraham believed God, and shaped his whole life to this "heavenly vision." The "Land of Promise," as God mapped it before the eyes and the faith of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Moses, was three times as large as the Israelites conquered under the lead of Joshua, and was not fully possessed till Solomon's day. This geographical and historical fact is eloquent of the truth that the Christian Church has not even yet appropriated either in experience or in missionary conquest the major part of God's promises as seen by "men of vision" in every age.

Moses's vision of the little country of Palestine—about the size of New Hampshire—which was to bulk large in historic usefulness, suggests as a home missionary thought that other little commonwealths have been and may be "great" in history; for example, "Great Britain" has been a world leader in missions, in education, in constitutional government. This lesson is written in Holland, another little country of a great history. Its capital is decorated, as we write, in celebration of a hundred years of peace and of constitutional freedom. A new Holland cabinet begins the new century with the responsibility put upon it by the recent world parliament on opium of completing a universal treaty that was initiated by the United States Government "for the suppression of the opium evil." In this Christian, humanitarian, commercial crusade, this little country has again the opportunity for a service as far-reaching in benefit as when she gave shelter and godspeed to the Puritans.

"I have caused thee to see it . . . but thou shalt not go over thither." Here is a profound truth that the best of men need to be constantly on guard lest one careless utterance, one moment of impatient or injudicious action or speech may shorten a useful life or abridge a noble career. In the writer's boyhood there seemed to be many who thought it did not matter much what wrong a man did if he only repented of it before he died and got safely to heaven. But the story of Moses shows that a life predominantly good, unselfish and useful was shortened, and the greatest work ever committed to human hands was turned over to another, despite prompt repentance and forgiveness, because Moses, as the teacher and leader of a wayward and unreasonable people, lost his patience at Meribah (Num. 20: 1-13). The practical lesson is clear that the most faithful need to "watch and fight and pray" to prevent the marring of their usefulness by errors, whose results even forgiveness will not cancel.

"So Moses, the servant of God, died there." In Egypt, where Moses was brought up, kings and people thought too much of death. The chief efforts of the kings were devoted to building great pyramid tombs for themselves, while their people mostly lived in mud hovels. Perhaps that was one reason that the words of Moses were almost wholly devoted to right living in this world. He knew that men who live right here do not need to worry about getting to heaven. But the tendency of our day is to think too little of death and to assume that because God is good, men who are bad will fare as well beyond death as if they had lived rightly. Death is treated in the Bible as important because character and conduct this side of death determine rewards and punishments beyond. Because theologians have debated what God may do beyond death for men who had no knowledge of the truth here, a lot of selfish and sinful rascals have eagerly jumped to the conclusion that hell is abolished. Hell for the wilfully wicked is as clearly promised as heaven for those who repent and struggle to do right. And there is nowhere any Bible encouragement to expect that the man who has rejected offered salvation all his life will have any new opportunity beyond death. "It is appointed unto men once to die, and after that the judgment." Therefore the important thing about death to each man is—not where or when or how, but was he, like Moses, "the servant of God?" The value of real service for God and man is recognized. "The servant of God" will also serve mankind. What honor is thus put on the word "servant"! The idler may well tremble at the coming of death as a neglectful, slothful servant when called to account by his master. God expects us not alone to be good, but also to be good for something.

The Golden Text, "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints," is beautifully illustrated in the death of Moses. He had made mistakes and even fallen into sins, but all had been forgiven. He of whom it had been said that he "talked with God face to face as a man talketh with his friend," spent his last earthly hours thus talking with God in the mountain top.

Those who think of death as a gruesome, unwelcome theme should be reminded that on the Mount of Transfiguration the theme of the three who knew all about earth and heaven, of life and death, was the death of Christ, the "decease which Christ was about to accomplish at Jerusalem." Death was the glad theme of the greatest conversation on earth as it is the new song of heaven—death for the sake of others as the culmination of a life for others. Such a death was spoken of as an accomplishment, a great achievement. The word translated "decease" means "exodus." Moses speaks of Christ's atoning death as a new exodus out of Egypt to the land of promise. Every Christian death is an achievement, a glorious exodus, worthy of Miriam's song, "The Lord hath triumphed gloriously." This is true not alone of martyrs known to fame, but of many other victorious lives. Think of the martyr Ridley, the night before he was burned alive at the stake. One of his pitiful friends offered to sit up with him in the prison. "Oh, no!" said the good man, "what would you do with yourself? I mean to go to bed and sleep as quietly as ever I did in my life. My breakfast to-morrow will be sharp and painful; but I am sure my supper will be right pleasant and sweet!"

I have a faith that life and death are one,
  That each depends upon the self-same thread,
And that the seen and unseen rivers run
  To one calm sea, from one clear fountain-head.
I have a faith that man's most potent mind
  May cross the willow-shaded stream, nor sink;
I have a faith, when he has left behind
  The earthly vesture on the river's brink,
When all his little fears are torn away,
  His soul may beat a pathway through the tide,
And, disencumbered of its inward clay,
  Emerge, immortal, on the summer side.

LOUIS FRECHETTE.

Another great truth illustrated by the story of Moses' death and his return to earth at the Mount of Transfiguration is that every right desire that is unfulfilled on earth will, in some way, be gratified in heaven. Moses' supreme desire to enter the land of promise was denied, but see him centuries after standing on its loftiest mountain with Elijah and the transfigured Christ as a participant in one of the greatest scenes that was ever witnessed in the Holy Land. "We shall be satisfied when we awake in his likeness."

Let us remember, most of all, what every such life as that of Moses should teach us, that not only are we to live forever, whether we will or no, in future happiness or woe, but we are to have unending influence for good or ill on earth.

Moses is immortal in influence on earth as the chief human figure in Judaism and Christianity, while in Mohammedanism he is second only to the founder. In the realm of civil law he is still the world's chief justice, on whose God-given code are built those of Justinian, Charlemagne and Alfred, the corner-stones of civilization.

When, in that future life, God cries to Dives, "Remember," his evil deeds rising in recollection shall make the hottest fires of hell in the remorse of an awakened soul. And the thought of how his wicked acts shall go on producing more and more of wickedness and woe shall add still hotter fires.

On the other hand, who can doubt that even beyond the heavenly honors of Moses, he will find his highest joy in seeing the immortal influence on earth of the words he spoke and the brave work he did. Jesus Christ was thirsty. "Jacob's well was there," though he had been seventeen centuries in heaven, and I have no doubt Jacob's heavenly joy was increased as he looked down and saw the Christ refreshed from the well he dug when on earth. Let us think not alone of heavenly mansions, but dig wells of immortal usefulness in this world that our works will "follow" us long after our earthly life is over.

The influence of one life upon another is well illustrated in the case of a Scotch soldier boy who went to the Crimean War. When he first came under fire of the Russian guns he felt like running away as fast as his legs could carry him. He said to himself that he was a born coward. His tongue clove to the roof of his mouth, his heart thumped like a sledge-hammer against his ribs, and his knees smote together. He looked over his shoulder, as the first movement toward retreat. Just then he was seized by two stout arms and the words rang in his ears, "Fie, fie, laddie! Think o' yer mither." That name awoke his courage, and he went forward into the thick of the fray, as if under his mother's eye. When one is tempted to cowardice or any other sin the memory of the noblest soul he has known—a father, a mother, a teacher, a comrade—may save the day. Let us come thus into other lives as an influence.

This appearance of Moses reminds us also that heaven is not a place of idleness, but of new and tireless service "day and night."

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—A RAPIDLY-INCREASING number of churches are experimenting toward children's worship in the great congregation. Next to the mother's knee is the morning worship of the church in bringing children the sense of God. Some pastors preach a seven-minute sermon to children before the second hymn. In some cases the children of eight and nine and less are then dismissed for a separate children's service in the church parlors or in a neighbor's house, in charge of some capable woman. Sometimes the Sunday school utilizes this opportunity for an extra hour of kindergarten or primary instruction, or both, with the whole Sunday school equipment at their disposal. It is a good time for the Junior Christian Endeavor or Children's Missionary Society to hold its meeting. The great thing, next to family worship, is to get the whole family to come to morning church together, at least for a part of the service, and so establish the church-going habit in childhood. Where this plan has been tried it has helped the church service, the Sunday school and home religion.

But the majority of the churches go on with childless Sunday morning services, though such a course has brought only one-fifth of the Sunday school into church membership. It is the worst possible case of "infant mortality," and should lead pastors to hold conferences and make inquiries as to the best ways of getting the children to church. This would partially solve that other troublesome question of holding the older boys and girls in church and Sunday school. If they have regularly attended both from childhood the mighty power of habit will help to hold them in the more independent years of later youth.

ROME'S DREAM OF A "CIVIL PRINCEDOM"

"SOME SAY THE POPE OF ROME IS AMBITIOUS OF TEMPORAL POWER OVER AMERICA"

Archbishop Ireland at Catholic Mass-Meeting at Milwaukee, Wis., August 11, 1913, as Reported in "America" (Catholic), August 23, 1913

BY PROF. W. H. T. DAU

BUT does all this really prove that Archbishop Ireland is ambitious of temporal power for the Papacy over America? Is he not simply pleading for re-establishing the Papacy in its former secular estates in Italy? Yes, that appears to be the primary object of his argument. Let us assume that the Papacy obtains its wish, and Rome becomes once more, as Archbishop Ireland puts it, "the free international city of the Christian world." The Pope would then have "civil independence." He would "not be the subject of a civil ruler." He would "have a territory of his own, where all nations are at home, where no nation is master." Now, then, the Pope thus vested with a civil princedom, and ruling the city of Rome and the Papal States, should be in a position to execute his "spiritual mission." Where? Why, at Rome and in the Papal domain, you say. Yes, but is that the Pope's "mission"? The Duke of Norfolk ascribed to Leo XIII a "world-wide charge." Archbishop Ireland declares the Pope to be "the teacher of nations." We appeal now to the logic of Archbishop Ireland's argument, and ask him to tell us whether the Pope, in order to discharge his mission effectively, must possess civil independence only somewhere, or everywhere. How does the fact that the Pope is the civil ruler over a certain number of square miles in Italy give him "civil independence" across the Alps, or across the English Channel, or on this side of the Atlantic? The Pope has a mission in Ireland; therefore, the Pope must have "civil independence" in Ireland. The Pope has a mission in Germany; therefore he cannot be subject to the German emperor. The Pope has a mission in the United States; therefore the government at Washington cannot be his master. This is the true scope of Archbishop Ireland's argument. The "Roman Question" is not merely an issue in Italian politics, but it is a question with which every government in the world is confronted. The reinstatement of the Pope as secular ruler over the city of Rome and the Roman States is a mere trifle in the settlement of this question. Remember that Archbishop Ireland has told us that "it is the connection between the Pope's possession of temporal power and the exercise of his spiritual jurisdiction that we must consider, if we are to have a correct apprehension of the Roman question."

The claim of civil princedom which is set up by Archbishop Ireland for the Papacy must be world-wide, because the mission of the Catholic Church is declared to be world-wide. That this is the meaning was shown, e.g., by the recent Ne Temere decree. Papal teaching by this decree declared marriages throughout the world, at which a Catholic priest has not officiated, to be concubinage. We had in this act a specimen of what the Papacy considers "freedom of action" and "civil independence." Bearing witness against a priest in a civil court was denounced as a crime by the Catholic hierarchs in Belgium. Another specimen!

But we have still more direct and striking testimony from Archbishop Ireland himself to show that he is ambitious of temporal power for the Papacy over America. In 1889, on November 10—by the way, the anniversary of Luther's birthday—there was "celebrated with pomp and ceremony" in the Cathedral of Baltimore the hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the Catholic hierarchy in the United States, which had been effected by a brief of Pius VI of November 6, 1789. Archbishop Ireland was one of the speakers on that occasion. His address has been published in the work cited before, Vol. I, pages 49-83. The theme was "The Mission of Catholics in America." The Archbishop of Philadelphia had spoken in the morning "of the glories and triumphs of the century that was then closing; the Archbishop of St. Paul spoke at the evening service "of the possibilities and duties of the century then opening." He chose for his text Ecclesiasticus 4: 33: "For thy soul strive for justice, and even unto death fight for justice, and God will overthrow thy enemies for thee." The sermon that was preached from this text was a rousing appeal to action, to aggressive work. There are remarkable passages in it, which stricture the utility of nominal, indolent, lethargic church membership. The necessity of church members co-operating with the divine power in advancing the interests of the church is shown. It is even asserted that laymen, independently of their priests, bishops, or the Pope himself, may take the initiative in aggressive church work.

The sermon also contains this splendid acknowledgment: "An inestimable advantage to us is the liberty which the church enjoys under the constitution of the United States. Here no tyrant casts chains around her; no concordat limits her action or cramps her energy. Here she is as free as the eagle upon Alpine heights, free to unfold her pinions in unobstructed flight, and to soar to loftiest altitudes. The law of the land protects her in her rights, and asks in return no sacrifice of these rights, for her rights are those of American citizens." "America treats us well; her flag is our protection."

Such being the case, what is the purpose of the speaker in choosing his warlike text, and calling upon Catholics to "fight for justice"? This is the reason: "Do Catholics in America put into the work of religion the sleepless earnestness that characterizes them in secular affairs? As Catholics too often are and too often do, failure in religion is inevitable." What is the work of religion in which Catholics appear to the archbishop sluggish? "Let me state, as I conceive it, the work which, in God's providence, the Catholics of the United States are called to do within the coming century. It is twofold: To make America Catholic, and to solve for the church universal the all-absorbing problems with which religion is confronted in the present age. Never, I believe, since that century the dawn of which was the glimmer from the Eastern Star, was there prepared for Catholics of any nation of earth a work so noble in its nature and so pregnant with consequences as that which it is our mission to accomplish. The work defines the measure of the responsibility. The work is to make America Catholic. As we love America, as we love the church, it suffices to mention the work, and our cry shall be, 'God wills it!' and our hearts shall leap toward it with Crusader enthusiasm." "The conversion of America should ever be present to the minds of Catholics in America as a supreme duty from which God will not hold them exempt."

Over and against the diffidence of some of his brethren who believe the conversion of America an impossible task, Archbishop Ireland holds: "Non-Catholic Americans deserve, by their splendid natural virtues, that we labor to impart to them the plenitude of Christ's faith; and neither in disposition nor act do they place obstacles in our pathway. They are clever, intelligent, ready to listen, anxious to know what is the truth. They are fast putting off the old traditional prejudices against the church. If they still retain some prejudice, the fault is ours. Either we have not sufficiently proved our faith by our manner of life, or we have not presented the truth with due urgency, and by methods that captivate attention. The alienation of non-Catholics in America from the church is an inherited misfortune. They have deeply religious instincts; vital Christian principles are rooted in their modes of thought and social practices. America is at heart a Christian country. As a religious system, Protestantism is in a process of dissolution; it is without value as a doctrinal or moral power, and it is no longer a foe with which we need reckon. The American people are generous, large-minded and large-hearted, earnest in all things, sincerely desirous of moral and intellectual growth." Surely these are facts, and many of the unconverted Americans to whom Archbishop Ireland refers owe these "splendid virtues," not to nature, but to grace, to their religion, to their unconverted churches. When these unconverted Americans look upon "converted" Mexico, "converted" South America, "converted" Spain, etc., they may experience some aversion to Archbishop Ireland's converting efforts.

But it would be a grand achievement, the archbishop holds, to convert America: "The value of America to the cause of religion cannot be overestimated. This is a providential nation. How youthful and yet how great! A hundred years ago the States hardly exceeded the third million in population; to-day they approach the sixty-fifth million. Streams of immigration from the lands of the earth are turned toward us. There is manifestly much in our soil and air, in our social and political institutions; for the world's throngs are drawn to us. The country must grow and prosper. In the solution of social and political problems, no less than in the development of industry and commerce, the influence of America will be dominant among nations. There is not a country on the globe that does not borrow from us ideas and aspirations. The spirit of American liberty wafts its spells across seas and oceans, and prepares distant continents for the implanting of American ideas and institutions. This influence will grow with the growth of the nation. Estimates have been made as to our population a century hence, placing it at 400,000,000, due allowance being had in this computation for diminution in the numbers of immigrants. The center of human action and influence is rapidly shifting, and at a no distant day America will lead the world. The native character of the American people fits them to be leaders. They are earnest, deliberate, aggressive. Whatever they believe they act out: whatever they aim for they attain. They are utterly incapable of the indifference to living interests and of the apathy which, under the specious name of conservatism, characterize European populations. The most daring elements of other lands have come hither to form a new people—new in energy, new in spirit, new in action—in complete adaptation to a new epoch in the world's history. We cannot but believe that a singular mission is assigned to America, glorious for itself and beneficent to the whole race—the mission of bringing about a new social and political order, based more than any other upon the common brotherhood of man, and more than any other securing to the multitude of the people social happiness and equality of rights. With our hopes are bound up the hopes of the millions of the earth. The church triumphing in America, Catholic truth will travel on the wings of American influence, and encircle the universe."

We bow our heads in reverence and humility to the God who has made America a great country, and say, with the ancient patriarch: "We are not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which Thou hast showed unto thy servants." If it should please Almighty God to make our country still greater, we pray him to increase our humility proportionately to our greatness, and especially to keep our leaders humble men, free from the imperialistic strivings which can easily inflame high-minded men. Like the full ear of wheat let us bend lower and still lower, as the blessings of providence freight us with its beneficent wealth.

We can understand why this wealthy, healthy, noble-spirited, energetic America should suggest itself to a Catholic hierarch as a splendid center of influence, as a splendid fulcrum for a lever that may lift the nations of the earth. We can understand why an imperial-minded Papacy should regard a Catholic America—the United States converted to Catholicism—as a most valuable asset. For, then, the dogma of the Pope's civil princedom, of the "dignity" and "outward form" of the Papacy as necessary for the execution of its world-wide mission, would receive strong champions. But we hope for no lesson of humility from such an event. Proud, overbearing Rome would simply use the might of America for the realization of its dream of world-rule.

Two thousand years ago there came upon earth One with a mission, such as Archbishop Ireland claims for his church—a mission to save souls. He went about in poverty and want, disdaining the pomp and glory of earthly greatness, thinking nothing of "the integrity of outward form" and of "dignity." He said to his followers: "Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart." His great apostle urged his example upon the Christians of all ages, saying: "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: who being in the form of God thought it not robbery to be equal with God: but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." The spirit of meekness was the glory of his ministry. It did not interfere with his mission at all. It was the endearing element in that mission. Pointing to the lowly Lord and Saviour, the prophet cries: "Behold my servant, whom I have chosen; my beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased: I will put my Spirit upon him, and he shall show judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets. A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory. And in his name shall the Gentiles trust." Walking in his footsteps, the early disciples commended his teaching to the world.

Now, we are told by Archbishop Ireland that the mission of the church, which is declared to be none other than the mission of Christ, requires a "civil princedom of the Pope," requires the removal of "the stress of unpropitious circumstances," requires "outward form." This is not a new claim. Archbishop Ireland has said in America and to Americans what his church has always and everywhere proclaimed as her fervent belief. And we in America who read Archbishop Ireland's utterances at the time, have understood him as well as Lucas Cranach the Elder understood the spiritual ancestors of Archbishop Ireland when he drew his famous

NEW YORK'S SEAMEN'S CHAPEL

THE Chapel of Our Saviour of the Seamen's Church Institute was opened on a recent Sunday afternoon at 25 South Street, New York, with a service conducted by the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, rector of Trinity Church. The Right Rev. Dr. William F. Nichols, Bishop of California, who was attending the Forty-fourth General Convention of the Episcopal Church in New York, preached the opening sermon. The chapel was built with funds raised by the churches and parishes of the dioceses of New York, Long Island and Newark.

NEW YORK'S SEAMEN'S INSTITUTE

Bishop Nichols said in his sermon that the chapel was typical of the "largeness of heart of this city. Its beneficence goes out through many channels that are unknown. You can no more judge of the largeness of heart of this city by the reports sent out by its Boards of Missions than you could judge of its population by walking up Broadway."

Archbald R. Mansfield, superintendent of the Seamen's Church Institute, announced that the altar in the chapel had been given as a memorial to Stuart Randolph. The altar vases were the gifts of the Altar Chapel of Zion and St. Timothy; the cross was the gift of Mrs. William Rhinelander; the communion service was the gift of Miss Frances G. de Peyster in memory of her mother, Mrs. Augusta McEvers de Peyster; the reredos was given by Miss Mary R. Hall; the rector's chair was the gift of Orme Wilson, Jr. The brass lectern was the gift of Mrs. Francis C. Lowell, and the organ was given by Miss Caroline Prime.

Edmund L. Baylies, chairman of the building committee of the Seamen's Church Institute, explained how the funds for the present institution had been collected. The site at 25 South Street was selected by himself and Mr. Mansfield, the superintendent of the institute, as being the "strategic point" for an institution of its kind, where the seafaring men coming to these shores could be brought together. Mr. Baylies also said that the site of the building was bought before a single dollar was raised to pay for the building, the site alone costing $85,000.

A CANNIBAL VILLAGE TO-DAY

wild, shouting savages, brandishing war-clubs, abandoning themselves to the frenzied impulses of their mad minds.

During the time this was going on, Jim, Ratu Kadavu's servant, who is a particularly good type of a large, muscular race, approached me, ran his hand around my waist and slowly down my thigh and smacked his lips with a wicked smile. I laughed at this display of aboriginal humor—but not very heartily—for the sword of the French captain still swung before my eyes.

When the dance was over we decided to start back for Suva. The trip through the river reveals many characteristic bits of tropical scenery. Mangrove trees line the banks for miles, constricting the narrow channel so that at some of the turns the bow and stern of our steamer touched the overhanging branches. Long stretches of sugar-cane fields extend back from the banks, alternating frequently with banana plantations and cocoanut groves. When, by the light of the moon, which had risen before we came out on the sea again, the sky became alive with the black forms of flying foxes, the last detail to make the picture complete had been added.

When the lights of the steamers and the waterfront of Suva began to appear through the darkness ahead, the consul apologized for the lack of interesting sights he had been able to show us in Bau.

"Aside from the few relics of Tanoa and Cacobau," he said, "Bau contains nothing more interesting than any other village. I feel that as far as cannibalism is concerned, you saw very little to-day that would give you an adequate idea of it." I looked at the consul without replying; evidently our ideas differed. The steamer was approaching the landing. The lights of the Victoria Drive ran along our right in two straight lines that met in the remote distance. The dock was figured with people walking about in the cool of the night. In a few moments more we were ashore in the midst of British civilization.

Passionale of Christ and Antichrist in 1521. Dramatically the absolute disharmony between the spirit of Christ and the spirit of the Papacy was exhibited in those twenty-six cuts of the German artist. When during the "Kulturkampf" in Germany Pope Pius IX addressed a letter to the German Emperor William I, and the German emperor sent him his noble reply, Professor Robert Hoffman of Leipzig republished Cranach's "Passionale" with the Pope's and the emperor's letters appended. It would be desirable that these ancient cuts were republished in an English edition, to show Americans what it means when the Papacy carries on its mission with "dignity" and "outward form."

We close our review of Archbishop Ireland's "unanswered wonderment" at Milwaukee. The indignant surprise of Archbishop Ireland, expressed on August 11, cannot but create most painful surprise outside of his own church. For he has himself championed the very insanity for which he denounces his Protestant critics.

—Missionary T. J. Bach, of Maracaibo, Venezuela, S. A., writes: "Your two letters of August 14, together with two checks, were received by the last mail from the United States, and brought us on our knees, and once more we thanked the Lord for the good work of The Christian Herald. Please accept our heartiest thanks on behalf of the work here in Venezuela, and I assure you that we shall use it to the Lord's honor and for the welfare of this neglected people. And please thank the unknown sister. Political conditions here are uncertain. Several battles were fought near our station in the interior. As a rule, the men in power are in favor of our work. And the good Lord has promised to watch over his own."

What's Coming?

What will she find on the breakfast table?

Will it be Puffed Wheat or Rice—the crisp, porous grains which taste like toasted nuts?

Will it be these airy wafers, bubble-like and thin? These dainty morsels of which few children ever get enough?

Or have you forgotten? Will some less-liked cereal disappoint the child?

Each kernel of wheat or rice contains more than one hundred million granules. For ease of digestion those granules must be broken.

Prof. Anderson's way—in Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice—explodes every granule by steam. The result is the best-cooked cereal foods which have ever been created. Every atom of food value is here made available.

That's another reason why the child should find Puffed Grains on the morning table.

With Cream

For Breakfast serve with cream and sugar, or mix with any fruit.

The grains are crisp and nut-like, thin and fragile. They have an almond flavor, due to terrific heat.

There is nothing like them. Never before was grain made so inviting. Never before were kernels exploded to eight times normal size.

Use also like confections. Scatter like nut meats over a dish of ice cream. Use in frosting cake—use in candy making.

Crisp in butter or serve dry—like peanuts—for between meal foods.

Wherever nuts are good, Puffed Grains are good, and much easier to digest.

With Milk

For Supper or luncheon or bed-time, serve in bowls of milk. The grains will float like bubbles. They are crisper than crackers and four times as porous as bread.

They are whole-grain foods made wholly digestible, and they melt into toasted morsels with a most inviting taste.

Serve them any hour, for they don't tax the stomach, and every atom feeds.

These foods are right at your door. Every grocer supplies them. The moment they come they are ready to serve.

Why let millions enjoy them while you go without them? Order a package of each.

SABBATH PRIVILEGES

I HAVE been thinking a great deal lately about the non-attendance of God's people at church and Sunday school. A short time ago I lay awake thinking of the beauty of Solomon's temple; how he used every means to make it beautiful and something to excite the admiration and love of God's people; and how the faithful would travel long distances over rocky lands and sandy deserts, showing what at a high privilege they considered it to be among God's chosen. Then my thoughts reverted to God's temple in this day and generation. Do his people have the love for it they should have? Do they consider it the high privilege to enter its portals and name the sacred name on their lips and say "Our Father"?

When Christians awake Sabbath mornings, do they have in mind this high privilege? Is the Sabbath so sacred to them that the very atmosphere is different; that the sun shines more brightly and the birds sing more sweetly?

Why should a Christian have his library and his living-room strewn with Sunday newspapers, filling the minds of his household with fascinatingly written accounts of wickedness? Why don't Christians, for one day of the week, dispense with all this and clothe their minds with healthy literature?

A Christian has the high privilege of living through one day in the week in the atmosphere of heaven; he has the highest privilege ever accorded a human being, that of attending God's house and singing praises of gratitude for his heavenly Father, and enjoying the beauty of holiness. What a cool reception it must be for a visitor to God's house to find only a few scattered attendants? Will they feel that the little interest shown by God's people means that there is nothing in worship?

What would the world think if God's people were seen flocking to his house?

TRACES OF A PREHISTORIC EMPIRE

RECENT research among the island groups in the Pacific would seem to confirm the theory that the various clusters of islets that dot the great ocean, and which are still the home of semi-savage tribes, formed in some long-past age part of an extensive continent and the center of a great civilization. Archeologists have been puzzled over the colossal stone images of Easter Island, but even these are eclipsed by the interest which has been aroused in the massive submarine ruins lately discovered in the neighborhood of the Caroline group. These islands have been described as "an enchanted region of archeology," remarks a writer in the Dominion, a leading journal of Wellington, New Zealand. Memorials of a long forgotten race (like that of the legendary Atlantis), lie scattered on every hand throughout the group, notably at Ponape and Kusaie. There are massive ruins at the former place of a strange water town, an ancient island Venice. Hundreds of acres are covered with the remains of walls, canals, and earthworks of the most stupendous character, built upon a general plan such as could only have been conceived by men of power and intelligence. By whom and for what purpose they were built are questions that have given rise to various speculations. The inhabitants of the present day can tell us nothing.

With a view to investigating the subject and endeavoring to find some solution of the problem Professor Macmillan Brown, of Christchurch, visited the Carolines, and he has come back with an entirely new theory as to the origin of the ruins. He says:

"We reached the ruins at 5 o'clock one morning, and I explored them till noon. They form a sort of Venice, built on the reef, not on the land, and on the edge of the reef, so that behind the great temple of Nautauch there is deep water even at low tide. Enclosing the ruins, which cover a vast area, is a great breakwater of enormous stones, with one exit behind the temple, so that the ruler of this city could escape even when the tide was at its lowest. The entrance is now blocked up with great heaps of immense stones, and my theory is that this was done by the last ruler, fearing an attack from some enemy from the sea.

"You can sail for miles along the canals of this great ruined city, and on either side rise the most stupendous breastworks, stones from five feet in diameter and ten feet to twenty feet in length being piled one on top of the other. These breastworks enclose artificial islands formed on the reef, and on these islands stand great megalithic buildings. The sight was one of the most impressive I have ever seen. I have visited Stonehenge and Avebury, in England, Tiahuanaco in the Andes, Cuzco in Peru, and all the ruins of Central America and Mexico; yet I can safely say that these are the most stupendous ruins of all. Some of them are partly hidden by luxuriant vegetation, but they are all in a fairly good state of preservation, and will stand for thousands of years yet. They must have involved hundreds of years of labor by thousands of men, working in concert and under command. It is perfectly true that the blocks of which the walls are formed are basaltic crystals, pentagons, hexagons, and heptagons, but there must have been tremendous labor in separating these from the cliffs away in the north of the island, twenty miles off. And there must have been as much labor again in rafting them down to this immense city, and still greater labor in getting them from the rafts on to these great walls. I calculate that no island like Ponape, which is only about twelve miles long and twelve miles broad, could ever have supported the population from which was drawn the muscle to build this titanic city. Ponape at its utmost could not support more than 20,000 people. If you allow 20 per cent. as able-bodied men you get 4,000.

"Now, no community can afford to allow more than 20 per cent. of its able-bodied men to be drawn off on works of what we might call luxury. The rest must be producing food and other necessaries. We, therefore, have only 800 of these able-bodied men capable of being used at any one time on the building of these stupendous structures. I calculate that not less than 10,000 men would be needed to do the work of quarrying, rafting, and building. It therefore follows that the dynasty that built this city must have had command of ten times as many big islands as Ponape. In other words, that empire must have sunk, for there are no such islands there now. There must have been a great area over which those emperors ruled. Where is it now? I say that it is under the sea."

A SET OF WONDERFUL BOOKS FOR EVERY CHRISTIAN

"THE FUNDAMENTALS OF THE FAITH"

FOR two or three years past, little volumes, about pocket-size, have been coming at intervals to the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through the mail from Chicago. Each volume bore the general title of

"The Fundamentals"

The editor was surprised and delighted with the little volumes, which were filled with articles of great force and ability, written by some of the ablest expositors of the Christian faith now living. Every book of the ten was a new and delightful surprise, and the whole set, taken together, and placed in the hands of a reader of average intelligence, was almost the equivalent of a Theological Course in a University.

When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD learned that these wonderful little volumes were produced through the liberality of two Christian laymen, who had set apart a fund to print and circulate them among pastors and teachers, it was decided that, if possible, the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should have an opportunity to possess sets of these precious little books. Accordingly, through the kind co-operation of Dr. R. A. Torrey (Dwight L. Moody's long-time Gospel associate), an arrangement was completed by which The Fundamentals are to be supplied to us in any quantities desired, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD pledging itself to make no profit on The Fundamentals but to sell them at cost of publication and expressage with renewal or new subscriptions.

This arrangement being satisfactorily completed, we are now enabled to announce that any subscriber sending in his or her own renewal, and desiring to secure a set of the ten precious volumes of The Fundamentals, may do so by accepting the offer outlined in the last paragraph of this article.

Right here, the interested reader will very properly pause to ask:

"What are The Fundamentals?"

We answer, with emphasis, that they are the ablest, wisest, clearest and most convincing exposition of the foundation truths of the Christian faith that has ever been prepared by consecrated modern scholarship, and which is now presented to the world in a form which all can understand.

In this age of unrestrained religious freedom, with its allurements and specious cults, false doctrines and skepticism, both open and disguised, it is of the highest importance that the foundation principles should be clearly understood by those who profess Christianity. To meet this universal need the best consecrated scholarship of our day has been enlisted in the preparation of a series of booklets dealing with "The Fundamentals." They are accurate, enlightening, and conclusive. They deal with vital facts in the history, doctrine and development of the Christian Church and they present the belief of that church to-day in clear and simple language.

With The Fundamentals at hand, one may become familiar with almost every great question affecting the modern church; may inform himself concerning disputed points. It has been well said that this series of ten little volumes—each small enough to be put in one's coat pocket—is a spiritual armament for the defense of the faith, and a priceless treasury for the Bible student and teacher and the man and woman in everyday life.

Below we give the names of a few of the long list of famous Christian scholars who write for The Fundamentals, and the titles of their contributions:

IN ME YE SHALL HAVE PEACE!*

LONG days and nights this restless bed
Of daily, nightly weariness and pain!
Yet thou art here, my ever-gracious Lord,
Thy well-known voice speaks not to me in vain—
"In me ye shall have peace!"

The darkness seemeth long, and even the light
No respite brings with it; no soothing rest
For this worn frame; yet in the midst of all Thy love revives. Father, thy will is best.
"In me ye shall have peace!"

Sleep cometh not, when most I seem to need
Its kindly balm. O Father, be to me
Better than sleep; and let these sleepless hours
Be hours of blessed fellowship with thee.
"In me ye shall have peace!"

Not always seen the wisdom and the love;
And sometimes hard to be believed, when pain
Wrestles with faith, and almost overcomes.
Yet even in conflict thy sure words sustain—
"In me ye shall have peace!"

Father, the flesh is weak; fain would I rise
Above its weakness into things unseen.
Lift thou me up; give me the open ear,
To hear the voice that speaketh from within—
"In me ye shall have peace!"

Father, the hour is come; the hour when I Shall with these fading eyes behold thy face,
And drink in all the fulness of thy love;
Till then, oh speak to me thy words of grace—
"In me ye shall have peace!"

Church Federation in China

THE churches of China have combined! All the Protestant churches of the Oriental republic, according to the latest reports, have joined hands under the common name, "The Christian Church in China." Under the leadership of Dr. John R. Mott, a long series of federation conferences was recently held. Representatives of the different denominations seem to have come at last into practical agreement. The Protestant missions have agreed on a form of co-operation and united effort. Even in higher educational work, it is said, union is being effected as rapidly as possible.

In West China, at Chengtu, the Baptists, Canadian Methodists, English Quakers and American Methodists have united in most of their schools. In North China the American and English Methodists have united in one theological school, and the Presbyterians and Congregationalists in another. The women of all the missions in North China and in West China have combined in all medical instruction and college work. They are planning to accomplish similar union in Central and Southern China. In Foochow, in Southern China, the Methodists and the Congregationalists have united in the theological school and the Methodists have united with the Anglicans in the medical school.

To invent new ways of co-operation a committee has been appointed, composed of representatives of the various churches. This is the "China Continuation Committee." It will meet once a year, and the executive portion of the committee will meet separately three times a year to plan "next steps" in the solidifying of Protestant effort in China.

Bishop Bashford, of the Methodist Board of Foreign Missions, who has actively helped in bringing about the federation, says: "We believe that our agreement upon a common name, upon a common policy for all our churches, upon union in all our higher educational work, upon a common hymnbook, a common translation of the Bible, and with a committee meeting periodically to carry out the policies already adopted and to devise additional steps for co-operation, will enable us to avoid much of the denominational rivalry which prevails in the United States, and to use all the men and money placed at our disposal for the most rapid evangelization of this nation. Indeed, we think our federation in China may in time lead to a more perfect union there and possibly help the churches at home toward a larger co-operation."

"JESUS IS HERE!"

did he turn for one moment to look at the house before he went on? Virginia continued to stand in the shadow after he had disappeared, and was still there when Rachel came down and said: "Oh, Mr. Stanton has gone. He did not stay very long. Did you drive him away?"

"No. He had a good deal to do to prepare for to-morrow."

"Ah, what a day it will be, Virginia! Do you not long for it?"

"Yes, and fear it also."

"Let us not fear but anticipate. I will sing—yes—I will sing 'Where he leads me I will follow.'"

Rachel went over to the piano and in the shadow there sat down and sang while Virginia sat in the library, her head bowed—new impulses stirring in her, new desires awakening, but in her soul knowing that, deepest and best of whatever might come, the greatest was this well-nigh unthinkable coming into the world again of Jesus.

"Jesus is here!" she murmured, as Rachel sang. And the refrain beat back and forth in her heart like a sweet deep-toned bell.

The people of Raymond awoke to that remarkable Sunday in its history with one thought. Long before eight o'clock the street in front of the First Church was thronged with people of all sorts. Automobiles were strung all along both sides and around the block. By the time the doors were opened the crowd was more like a mob than anything else.

Mr. Maxwell's people had during the last five years remodeled the building, increasing its seating capacity to two thousand five hundred. The Sunday school departments were in special rooms below. Owing to the unusual circumstances of the service, Maxwell had directed his Sunday school officers to plan their work so that as many of the children as possible could get into the morning service.

Jasper Carter had come in time to secure a seat in the gallery. He sat there watching the great crowd pour in, a cynical smile on his hard face and the words on his lips in undertone—"What fools these mortals be!" He had not been to church for years. His paper had contained an editorial two weeks before advocating the closing of the churches as useless appendages to modern progress, meaning by progress, material, physical, money-making human energy.

By half past nine the crowd outside was so dense and unruly that a detachment of police was on hand to preserve order. At ten o'clock the chairman of the board of trustees, Dr. West, rose and faced the people who were getting restless, and announced that the service would shortly begin, as all the people were in the church, and that an outdoor meeting would be held at the close of the indoor service. This word was passed to the impatient crowd outdoors and did much to subdue the multitude, which continued to wait and increase in number until the whole street was packed with excited people.

The door at the side of the pulpit platform opened and the organist, the choir, and Rachel went up into the choir loft. Then three persons came out, Mr. Maxwell, Mr. Stanton, and a third. People in the back seats of the galleries stood up. Every eye was on that third Figure. And in a stillness like death, or as if the audience stood at the threshold of a new chapter of human history, that unparalleled service in the First Church of Raymond began.

CHAPTER IV

IT WAS Monday morning and Jasper Carter was in his office at the Gazette building talking with Barnes, his oldest reporter.

"Oh, of course, I grant it was a most remarkable occasion, and all that, and it will cause a sensation and make a good story, but your account of it won't do, Barnes. It simply won't do. Why, in this," Carter brought his fist down on a pile of notes on his desk, "you positively state that this person is Jesus in person, the same Jesus who was here centuries ago."

"And he is," said Barnes.

Carter burst out angrily. "Oh, look here, Barnes, that simply won't do, you know. We can't afford to be responsible for such a statement. Besides, what is the use, when we can put out just as good a story without saying that this person really is Jesus?"

"But I believe he really is."

Carter sat back in his chair and eyed Barnes curiously.

"You really believe he is, do you?"

"Yes, Mr. Carter, I do. I believe it with all my mind. I do not believe any living man could have said the things he said yesterday in the First Church in the way he did."

"Do you consider the absurdity of your position, Barnes? Is it possible for such a stupendous thing as that to happen, to be a fact, in this age of the world?" Carter fairly shouted.

"Why not? What has the age got to do with it?"

"Oh, it is—well, it is just sheer nonsense. Why argue? Only, I say, this story of yours is not like you, Barnes. And while it's mighty good stuff—mighty—good—stuff—it does not go in. I won't stand for it."

"You stand for a lot of things you don't believe in every day, and they go into the Gazette every day."

"Maybe they do," Carter retorted, red in the face, "but this does not go in. So that is settled. Strike out all this about 'firm convictions that this remarkable person is Jesus,' etc., and we can use the rest."

"You can strike them out, Mr. Carter, but I shall not, because I believe every word I have written there."

"Oh, well, what is the difference? When is that photograph going to be ready?"

Barnes looked at the editor of the Raymond Gazette with the same look that was on his face when he came into the office from Mr. Grey's on that memorable Saturday.

"It is never going to be ready."

"What! Do you mean to say we can't get a picture of this—this—person?"

"It is my honest conviction that you never will get a picture of him for your paper."

"You have a lot of 'honest convictions' lately, Mr. Barnes." Carter spoke with a sneer. "Where did you get them?"

Barnes was on the point of saying he had never got them in the Gazette office, but after a moment, speaking with an unsual hesitation and with a heightening color:

"Mr. Carter, I am ready to say to you that I have come to have a firm belief in this—in Jesus Christ, and I am going to try to be a Christian."

An awkward moment followed. Then Carter said, as he broke into a short laugh: "A Christian, eh? Well, that ought to make a 'good story,' eh, Barnes?"

"It is a good story. The best I have ever heard."

"You don't really mean it?"

"Yes, I do, Mr. Carter. The greatest thing in all the world has come to me. I never knew what life meant before."

Carter looked at him frowningly. Barnes had been a cool, hard-headed, unscrupulous newsgetter; Carter's right hand for "story" writing; a man of varied mental equipment, invaluable in certain situations, not troubled with too much conscience or sensitiveness, a professional journalist of the sort that regards no man's privacy and is willing to ruin a character or pull down a reputation if necessary to get a good "story." Withal, an indefatigable worker, loyal to the Gazette and its policies.

Now, as Carter looked curiously at him what did the editor see? A new man? What! In two short days? Yet that is what he did see. The miracle of transformation had come to Barnes as he sat there in the First Church looking at that tremendous personality there on the platform, listening to his words, smitten down and then lifted up again by the prayer that closed the service. He could see it now—the great throng swelling the galleries, sitting on the platform, on the floor, wherever there was a spot allowed by the fire regulations. And the after-meeting, out on the church steps, when He came out there and the same unearthly hush fell over the street at the sight and sound of the Man. And Barnes would never forget how, once while this was happening, He had turned his head and looked over at Barnes, the clear, calm, compelling look which had drawn him like a cable of steel into that personal discipleship which he now knew nothing could ever break. And his last view of Jesus had been that closing glimpse of him as he walked through the crowd, his arms around the shoulders of two young men who were weeping, while the people in perfect stillness opened a way for them. And Barnes knew as he sat there in the office of the Raymond Gazette, facing its editor, the rumble of the city coming in through the windows—he knew that nothing in all the world was so mighty as this change in purpose and passion that had come to him, and that henceforth all things were to be governed and measured by this new definition of Christian discipleship. He knew he was 'born again" in that greatest of all miracles men have ever experienced, and that he was no more like the Barnes of last week than the robber on the cross is now like that bloody brutal figure that hung on the cross by the side of the Son of God.

But Jasper Carter was simply disturbed by what he saw in Barnes, and he anticipated something that might come up in the future. He turned and began to pick up some papers.

"When that cub, Logan, comes in send him here," was all he remarked to Barnes, who waited.

"He has not come back since you sent him up to Mr. Maxwell's Saturday."

"Send him in if he does come back," Carter said shortly, and Barnes went out.

The routine of the city editor went on, interrupted this morning in the case of Mr. Carter by the thought of what had happened to Barnes. More than once he put down the papers he was reading and stared across the litter on his desk at the vision of the old Barnes transformed by the new look. Then he would shake his head and resume his work.

At the end of an hour he was called up by Barnes from the reporters' room. "Logan is here; do you want to see him now?"

"Send him right up."

A minute later Logan came in. The "cub" reporter looked sullen and dishevelled. He was not shaved, and his general appearance told several stories of failure.

"Well!" snapped out Carter in his worst humor, "what have you got?"

"Nothing."

"Then that's what you'll get. Where have you been?"

"I went to the minister's, but he wouldn't let me in. I stayed up all night around the house, but—He—the Man—never came out. I got a seat on the platform yesterday with the folks that couldn't get any chairs, and I snapped him twice, and I tried him again out doors."

"Well?"

"Some one's monkeying with my camera." The boy spoke with sullen anger.

"You mean—"

"I don't get anything. I've changed my plates—"

"And you called yourself a professional photographer when you came in here."

"I am. But—"

"But what?"

"Nothing."

"That is what you are: 'but nothing.' Go back to Mr. Barnes. If he has any use for you, stay. If not, go."

The boy turned to go out. Carter called after him. "Leave your camera here. Everything."

Logan dropped his apparatus on the editor's desk and went out.

Carter eyed it with a look of incredulity.

"It is the twentieth century, and nothing is so sure as progress, money and science. I wonder what this prince of fakirs has to beat that combination? It would be worth knowing."

He sat at his desk and brooded for several minutes. But his thoughts were suddenly startled by a call over the tube from Barnes. His voice was strange and full of intense feeling.

"Mr. Carter, the person—the—one—I know as Jesus—is here and wants to see you."

A moment of astonishment on Carter's part. Then: "Send him up here."

"Very well." A pause. Then a note in Barnes's voice that Carter had never heard. "You will not—"

"I know how to be a gentleman when necessary." Carter called back, and then he faced his office door, every nerve tingling in spite of his usual proud and sneering indifference.

An hour later, Barnes down in the reporters' room had a sharp call from Carter.

"Come up here!"

He went up at once, and the first thing he noted when he went in was Carter's back as he bent over his desk apparently busy over something there. As Barnes entered, he wheeled around.

"Sit down. Close the door first."

It was after he came back to the editor's desk that Barnes noted the unmistakable signs of deep agitation on Carter's face.

"Well?" Barnes did not say it out loud, but every fiber of him questioned the editor.

Carter spoke with evident effort. "The person—is—well—interesting—and—"

"He is more than interesting, Mr. Carter. He is really Jesus."

Carter pulled himself together.

"He is just an unusually intelligent, well-bred, well-informed man. What you say, Barnes, is simply absurd. Do you know what he came to see me for?"

"No."

"He left this with me." Carter held up an ordinary typewritten manuscript. He asked me to read it."

"Will you?"

Carter dropped the paper on his desk.

"I have the usual amount of curiosity. I shall read it."

"But what—what did you talk about?"

"Well—he—spoke of seeing me in the gallery yesterday, and—then—he—well," Carter laughed a little unnaturally. "He talked to me about my spiritual life. Think of that, Barnes. Who in Raymond has ever talked to me about my spiritual life? The parsons never mentioned it to me."

"You don't give them an opportunity."

"I didn't give—him—an opportunity. First thing I knew we were deep in it. I will say for him that he first asked if I had the time."

"Mr. Carter," Barnes said eagerly, "if he—really is Jesus—isn't that—I mean his talking to you about your real self, isn't that exactly what might be expected? Do you know any other person in the world who would do it?"

"No, I don't. And I don't know any ıe else I would take it from. But hat's the use, Barnes? He is simply ı extraordinary—I will grant that—ctraordinary person with certain ypnotic gifts, perhaps. But when he ent out I watched the people he assed down in the office. They didn't ven turn to look at him. Out on the dewalk it was the same. He went is way like any average man unoticed."

"Perhaps it is only to those who acnowledge him as Lord that he reveals imself at all times. Do you remember the Light?"

"Oh, that light! It is another himera! It was just ordinary Zodical Light. What is the use of harkıg back to that?"

Barnes was silent, but he looked at 'arter with a wistful look that beonged to the new vision of his life.

"Do you realize how long you were ogether, Mr. Carter?"

"No."

"It was a full hour."

"You don't say! Honestly, I was eally interested. He was an unusual alker. And—" As if to conceal feelngs he did not want Barnes to know, 'arter turned to his desk and picked ıp Logan's camera.

"I didn't get so under the spell that missed a chance to get that picture ve've wanted."

"Did you ask his consent?"

"Of course I did not."

"And you said you could be a genleman if you had to—" Barnes began ıotly.

"Keep cool now. We are in the ıewspaper business. Are we, or aren't we? It is our business to get the news ınd interest the public. This camera ıs the noiseless sort with the new Kydon shutter. I had it resting on this pile of books, and it looked just like them. I got two good shots, and no one could tell when the thing went off. Take the plates down and develop. We can get them ready for the four o'clock edition."

Barnes took the camera without offering a word. He hesitated as if he wanted to ask some questions, but finally went away, leaving Carter seated at his desk. As he turned to look back into the office he saw Carter pick up the manuscript and bend over his desk in his usual reading attitude.

Twenty minutes later, Carter was aware that Barnes had come in, and was talking to him. How often he had spoken his name he did not know. But finally he turned around.

"These plates," Barnes was saying, "look at them."

He held them up in front of Carter. The editor looked. There was not a line, not a shadow visible on the glass.

Henry Maxwell was pacing his study that same Monday morning while these events were occurring at the office of the Raymond Gazette. Grey was with him. Both men were going over the scenes of the day before.

"It was a most astonishing day all through. Grey, did you ever dream that we would see such a sight as we saw yesterday?"

"No. It seems to me now as I think back over it that it must be a dream now."

As he spoke, there was a sound of voices, a man's and a woman's. A moment later Martha knocked at Mr. Maxwell's study. When he opened the door she said: "Jesus is going down town. He asked me to tell you he would be back for dinner."

The two men looked at her earnestly, and Mr. Maxwell said: "Martha, does it not seem like a dream to you that Jesus is actually our guest, and eating and sleeping in our house?"

"No, Mr. Maxwell, it does not seem like any dream to me. It is so real. And so natural. He is the most of a person I ever knew. I do not feel afraid of him as I have of some great men who have eaten and slept here."

Martha went back into the kitchen, and Maxwell turned to Grey.

"Could anything be more bewildering than what Martha said just now about Jesus going down town and coming back to dinner? Can you grasp that as a fact?"

"No. And yet, Maxwell, it is just such common things as that that were happening all the time when he was on earth before. Was it not just such things that made him one of us? We are so overawed by our constant thought of the supernatural in Jesus that we are actually afraid of enjoying his human commonness."

" 'An average man, only different,' as Martha says. But as I sat there on the platform yesterday I could not help asking continually, 'In what way different?' "

"He has not performed any miracles."

"Did you hear a rumor that no one has been able to get a picture of him?"

"No. How absurd! In a scientific world of cameras and light!"

"Well, I heard of it yesterday, but paid little attention, there were so many other tremendous things happening. You know Norman asked me to take notes on what He said. I was not able to put down more than the headings. Will you verify if I go over the main points?"

"Yes. I took some notes myself."

"Then we can compare. The striking thing about the whole message to me was its note of power concerning the church. 'The gates of death shall not prevail against it.' That seemed to ring all through the entire service like a bugle."

"Not a word, Maxwell, not a word of censure, fault-finding, calling attention to the pitiful weaknesses of us preachers and our poor little discipleship. Just comfort, courage, inspiration at the thought of the power of the church."

"Yes. But I have here a list of necessary things for the churches to do to add to the tremendous power they already possess. I don't have them in the order he mentioned them, but my notes give me these:

"First, a real union on the part of all the denominations for service. Not doctrinal or credal, but just helping to make a better world on his own working platform of love to God and men.

"Second, a definite program of the Kingdom in this age of the world. Did not your heart leap up, Grey, when he said it was the business of the churches to unite in order to have power enough together to take out of our civilization the curses of drink, lust, race prejudice, poverty, and war? What a quiet or tremendous climax that was when he pictured the new age which he said was possible when these vices we have always regarded as a part of civilization are taken away! The hopeful thing about it all was his calm assurance that they were not necessary."

"Yes. It has only just dawned on some churches and preachers that the great vices of mankind are less powerful than the Gospel.

"Then I have—Third, the possibility of a printed message every day to represent the church and its great work. We have no daily paper to speak for us. What would Christianity have been all these centuries without a Bible? Yet here we are to-day in a world of the daily printed page without anything to speak daily the message of Christianity as it really is. We need such an organ, not only for proclaiming God's righteousness, but for information concerning the greatness of the Gospel in its world-wide conquest."

"I noted in connection with that, his statement that the editors and owners of daily papers owe it to civilization that they use their papers to advance all human causes. If every great daily in all the great cities of the United PROOF!

That My Popcorn Crispette Machine Makes Men, Women and Even Boys Prosperous

Below they tell you themselves. They've made the money and TELL YOU HOW. It's simple—it's easy. They took right hold and started. We didn't ask them to write. Elated at their good fortune they couldn't hold in—they just had to write.

F. C. Thompson, Ore., "I am proud of my business and thank you for it. The big popper sits up by the window and throws out an aroma that stops everyone who passes, I do nothing but take their money and tell them all about it and mention you as the inventor. I took in $575 in first 27 days, and this month is doing as well up to date."

Mr Jackson of Ohio, says, I thought you would want to know how my boy is getting along. Saturday he got out his first batch of 120 packages. Sold them all. Monday 140 sold them all. Today 180, all gone. I feel this is the best investment I ever made. Thanking you for your kindness and courtesy." Population 500.

Mrs. L. E. Fuller, Tenn., "I have been using the little popper since January and like it better and better. Thank you very much for your kind information. I also want to express my appreciation of your courteous dealings with me since I first wrote you. There are so many fakes and frauds and it is a relief and pleasure to deal with a strictly honest firm."

H. C. Reherd, Mont., bought an outfit with a shaker popper and we sent him a large rotary. A letter just received says "they gave me the laugh when I started, but now they are taking off their hats. While the bunch is crying hard times, I am getting the nickles and dimes." Population 1800.

Oscar Johnson, Montevideo, Uruguay, Aug. 16, '12 "I am doing fine with your popcorn crispette outfit. Send me one of your latest catalogs as I want more outfits in a short time. Please send me a lot of formulas for candy also."

Geo. Sutherland, Idaho. "Had fine demonstration of crispettes at leading grocery, served it with milk Business is developing finely. I may need another outfit to set up 8 miles from here."

Geo. B. Culpeper, Ga. "I am pleased with the machine. Mr. Lewith is one of the finest men I ever knew. It is a pleasure to work with him. I don't think his equal can be found. With best wishes for you."

Dr. L. F. Inman, Nev. "It has been one month since I started to manufacture. I have no wasted any material and make the crispettes in full batches. The people seem to be satisfied with my goods. I have good success with the popper. I have not wasted or burned any corn and think on the whole I am not so slow to pick up a new business as some others. Everything works well with me and for a small town am selling as much as could be expected."

Raymond W. Hekox, N. Y. "Am well pleased with crispettes because everyone who has tried them claim they are perfect and never had anything better, and I can say that myself."

Mr. Ed. Moss, Iowa. "If anybody wants to know about the crispette business have them come here. The business I am doing will convince them that the crispette business is all right."

Mr. Chas. Greenfield, Mich., says, "everything works fine, satisfactory results, pleased." He has just helped us sell another outfit.

A Recent Picture of My Big Store in Springfield

C. M. Pinkston, Ga. "I am adding candies and would be glad if you would send me the formulas for making peanut and cocoanut candies. I am getting along nicely with crispettes. Several parties said they knew the crispettes were made on a Long machine."

We placed the first crispette machine in Coney Island, N. Y. Mr. Herrman uses my machines in Feltman's Pavilion. Go there any nice summer day and watch. You will see him begin about 9 a. m. and keep his machine going continuously until after midnight. Watch closely and you will see him cooking a batch every 7½ minutes and 500 pieces to the batch. This is at the rate of Forty dollars an hour or four hundred dollars in ten hours. He uses more of our machines in his factory and at other resorts around N. Y.

W. A. Furlong, Pa. Pop. 2,000. "I want to tell you, your machine is all right. Popped all of the 150 pounds of corn the first week."

John Byrod, Pa., bought a machine and placed it in a shoe store. Tells us the business paid for the machine in quick time. He states he is going to quit the shoe business and sell crispettes only.

We shipped a machine to Rochester. The man never saw a machine before Writes as follows about his first attempt. "I must have followed your directions pretty good. The crowd blocked the sidewalk and many came in the store. They bought as fast as two of us could wrap. Say, it was like a circus. Every one who tasted said, best they ever ate."

Crispettes Built this "Big Store" for me and made me Wealthy.

It will build a Store for you in your own home town. If you come to Springfield, I'll tell you how to go about it. If you live within 300 miles and buy I'll pay your traveling expenses.

SUCCESSFUL EGG FARMING

200 Eggs A Year Per Hen

HOW TO GET THEM

THE eighth edition of the book "200 Eggs a Year Per Hen" is now ready. Revised, enlarged, and in part re-written; 96 pages. Contains among other things the method of feeding by which Mr. S. D. Fox of Wolfboro, N.H., won the prize of $100 in gold offered by the manufacturers of a well-known condition powder for best egg record during the winter months. Simple as a, b, c,—and yet we guarantee it to start hens to laying earlier and to induce them to lay more eggs than any other method under the sun. The book also contains a recipe for egg food and tonic used by Mr. Fox, which brought him in one winter day 68 eggs from 72 hens; and for five days in succession from the same flock 64 eggs a day. Mr. E. F. Chamberlain, of Wolfboro, N.H., says: "By following the methods outlined in your book I obtained 1,496 eggs from 91 R. I. Reds in the month of January, 1902." From 14 pullets picked at random out of a farmer's flock the author got 2,999 eggs in one year—an average of over 214 eggs apiece. It has been my ambition in writing "200 Eggs a Year Per Hen" to make it the standard book on egg production and profits in poultry. Tells all there is to know, and tells it in a plain, common-sense way.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

States would help the church and the home in their battle with the world's gross vices there would not be a brewery or a saloon or a house of vice left in these cities at the end of ten years."

"What a splendid sweep of power went over the audience at that! I tell you, Grey, it seemed to me at that point, I felt as I never did before, the everlasting might of Jesus in action. All things seemed possible."

"But did you notice, sitting directly in front of Jesus, up in the gallery, was Carter of the Gazette? Does it ever seem possible to you that a man of Carter's ambitions will ever use his Gazette for Christian purposes? Remember how he has fought Norman and the churches all these years?"

"He will never change the policy of the Gazette until he himself is changed. I dread the appearance of the Gazette to-night. No doubt Barnes will have a 'story' in it that will be full of irreverence and sensationalism. Think of the caricatures Jesus will have to endure."

"He endured them while he was here before. Who understood him? Not even his own disciples. The cultured and the leaders in society and the high and mighty hated and jeered and finally crucified. It was only the 'common people that heard him gladly.' Can we expect it to be different now?"

"Yes. Because there are all the accumulations of centuries of martyrdom and discipleship between then and now. Grey, we live in an infinitely better world than was here when Jesus lived before. Did he not say so himself? It is that note in his message of yesterday that is going to give this age wings of courage and hope. The worst thing the devil has done for the churches this last quarter of a century has been to preach the doctrine of pessimism."

Mr. Maxwell was interrupted by a telephone ring. It was a call from Rollin Page, who had just got back from Chicago. He had called up Mr. Maxwell to say that their little girl Eloise was very sick.

"What!" Mr. Maxwell had exclaimed, shocked by the sudden news. "Oh, I am deeply sorry for you. Don't get anxious. Yes, I know Rachel was staying with Virginia while you were away. Dr. West is always splendid with children. Yes. I'll come right over if you want me to. You do? I'll come right over."

As he hung up the receiver he turned a serious look at Grey.

"Rollin says Eloise is very ill. She was not feeling very well when Rachel put her to bed Saturday. Yesterday morning she was worse, but insisted on her mother coming to sing. And oh, how Rachel did sing yesterday, Grey! It reminded me of sixteen years ago—and this morning Rollin says the change in the child is so alarming they have called in Jackson and Oswald to consult with West. Rachel is nearly beside herself. I must go right over."

Grey said something by way of sympathy for Rollin and Rachel, and as Maxwell was going out he walked along with him. As they turned the corner leading to Virginia's house, Grey suddenly paused and put his hand on Maxwell's arm.

"In case—do you suppose—if He knew—would He—do anything?"

"Who?" said Maxwell, who had been musing over the events of the last two days.

"Jesus. Would He not be able to cure Eloise? How do we know what power he has over disease and death?"

"Grey, I have been thinking of all that, together with any number of things that his coming suggests. How little we really know about him yet! But if He has the power, why should he now use it? Why not? Why not? Rachel—how she does love those children— Yes, I see no reason why He would not help them if he can—"

Maxwell hurried on to Virginia's,

A New Howard Watch

THE E. HOWARD WATCH WORKS begs to announce for limited sale, a new watch—the HOWARD 12-size Carvel, 17-jewel, extra-thin, open face, solid gold, at fifty-five dollars.

This new watch is thinner by one and one-third millimeters than the regular 12-size extra-thin HOWARD. The movement is adjusted to three positions, temperature, and isochronism; cased in a single-joint solid gold case of special design, exceedingly flat and compact.

Selling complete in 14K solid gold case at $55 — it is the only gold cased, 12-size HOWARD that you can buy for less than $75.

The small number that we are able to offer this year is due to the time and care given to all HOWARD movements and the necessarily limited output of an organization devoted to fine watches exclusively.

Your representative jeweler will doubtless have a few of these watches on exhibition during the next thirty days.

If you are interested in a reliable watch of the new thin-model type and possessing elements of the distinguished and the unusual, we advise you to make inquiry at an early date. It is an opportunity to own a 17-jewel HOWARD cased in solid gold at the very moderate price of $55.

A Howard Watch is always worth what you pay for it.
The price of each Watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD WATCH.
The jeweler who can is a good man to know.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

leaving Grey standing on the corner looking after him.

Before he rang the bell some one opened the door, and the moment he stepped into the hall he felt the passing chill of that breath that blows off the coast of Death. Before he had reached the foot of the stairs, Virginia was there. Her face told the story.

"A few minutes ago," her lips whispered. "The doctors think it was poison. A mystery. But oh, Mr. Maxwell, I am afraid for Rachel. Go to her."

Mr. Maxwell went upstairs. Rollin met him at the door of the room. He was remarkably calm, but Death in coming so near had left an imprint on his face and in his eyes. He laid his head on Mr. Maxwell's breast and groaned.

"Come in," he managed to say after a moment. "I don't know what will happen to Rachel."

Rachel was on her knees, her arms flung out across the bed. The three doctors were standing at the foot of it. Dr. West had tried to get Rachel out of the room. She had fought him like an animal and at last flung herself down as Mr. Maxwell now saw her.

He went up, put his hand on her head and said gently, "Rachel!"

There was no movement for a minute. Then Rachel moved her shoulders convulsively, and slowly turned her head and looked up.

Mr. Maxwell kneeled by her side. Rachel was tearless. But in the midst of the prayer that Maxwell began to offer she suddenly turned on her knees and caught Mr. Maxwell's arm.

"Oh!" she exclaimed. "I have just thought! Mr. Maxwell! Have you forgotten? Have you forgotten? Jesus is here! Send for him! He can bring Eloise to life! Send for him! Jesus is here!"

She rose to her feet and dragged almost fiercely at Mr. Maxwell. The doctors looked at one another. Mr. Maxwell tried to calm Rachel. But she seemed like one distracted. She kept exclaiming, "Send for him, Mr. Maxwell! Won't you? Send at once!"

Dr. West came over to Maxwell.

"Where is—He—"

"At my house probably by this time."

"I'll call him," Dr. West said briefly.

He went out into the upper hall and called up Maxwell's house. Martha answered. A few sentences were exchanged.

Then Dr. West came back into the death chamber.

"He will be here soon," was all the doctor said.

Rachel fell on her knees again, and this time without any violent outburst she said as she folded her hands together: "Jesus is here! He will bring my child to life again! Jesus is here! Oh, thank God, he is here!"

Then there was silence in that chamber. Mr. Maxwell's lips were moving in prayer for Rachel and Rollin while they all waited for His coming.

MY HAND IN THINE

"Oh, TAKE my hand, father," my little one cried,
"The dark all around me, stay close by my side!"
His hand in his father's, no longer he wept.
His tears were all over and sweetly he slept.

In the darkness of night when no helper is nigh,
"Oh, take my hand, Father!" how often I cry
The darkness brings round me a shadowy band,
"Oh, take my hand, Father; oh, take thou my hand!"

When shadows are falling and danger is near,
When weeping in sorrow or trembling in fear,
My soul in its conflict sends out a heart-cry,
"Oh, take my hand, Father, and stay thou close by!"

When through the dark river my footsteps are led,
Its cold waters chill me and fill me with dread,
The words of my darling shall still be my cry,
"Oh, take my hand, Father, and stay thou close by!"

JACK LONDON'S recent story, "John Barleycorn," is doing much and will doubtless do much more to wake people up to the actual wrong and folly of tolerting the saloon. Throughout the book e speaks confidently of the time when he saloon shall be a thing of the past nd when people will look back in mazement at the time when social, usiness and political matters were ransacted to so great an extent under he auspices, or at least in the presnce, of John Barleycorn.

Probably the greatest victory won or temperance during the present ear was the passage of the Sheppard-Kenyon bill at the close of the last sesion of Congress. This bill prohibits he shipment of liquor from wet territories into dry. Much of the temperance legislation of no-license States had been nullified by the fact that while it was illegal to sell liquor in the State, it could be imported. And once on the ground it was not difficult to find hidden ways of disposing of it. Senator Kenyon said, in supporting his measure: "The partnership of the Federal Government with the bootleggers should be permanently dissolved."

Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, superintendent of the New York City Anti-Saloon League, in a recent article in the Review of Reviews wrote:

"The saloon has been expelled from one-half of the population and from two-thirds of the geographical area of the country. In 1868 there were 3,500,000 people living in territory where the drink traffic had been outlawed; in 1900 the number had increased to 18,000,000; in 1908, or only eight years after, the number had doubled to 36,000,000, and to-day there are 46,029,750 persons, or a fraction over one-half of the population of the country, living in no-license territory. In the last five years the no-license population has increased a little over 10,000,000, which is more than 10 per cent. of the total population of the nation and 30 per cent. increase in the number living in "dry" districts. Since 1868 the population of the country has doubled, while the number of inhabitants of "dry" territory has increased over thirteenfold."

The latest prohibition State is West Virginia. A popular vote on the subject was ordered by the legislature in 1911, and took place on November 5, 1912. The amendment for prohibition was adopted by a majority of 92,342. One of the most gratifying reforms is about to take place in the District of Columbia, where the great number of saloons has been the cause of reproach and shame to the nation. The Jones-Works Excise bill for the District of Columbia will, on the first of November, 1914, abolish half of the drinking places in Washington. Other restrictions are added which will do much to make our capital a better city.

Still another most gratifying victory for temperance was the abolition of all saloons from the Panama Canal Zone on July 1, 1913. Thirty-five saloons doing business in the Canal Zone were put out of business by the authority of the Isthmian Canal Commission, which passed a resolution that no further licenses for the selling of intoxicants as a beverage shall be issued. Despite very strong influence upon Congress to restore the army canteen, the last Congress refused to report out of the committee the bill providing for its restoration.

The victory in Maine in which, by a bare majority of 758, the Constitutional provision for prohibition, which has been in effect for fifty-five years, has been continued, is sufficiently recent to be included in this brief review of temperance triumphs.

But the temperance war is still far from ended. Dr. Iglehart in the article above referred to says: "The liquor dealers have an enormously powerful machine whose jurisdiction embraces every State, city and village in the country, including the capital at Washington. They have more saloons than there are churches, more bartenders than ministers of the Gospel, and have a yearly business of a billion and a half dollars against the few millions devoted to religious purposes. Despite the defeats they have suffered in the last fifteen years, they are still tremendously strong."

The use of distilled liquors seems to be growing tremendously; although the use of fermented liquors is decreasing.

Knowing We Are Saved*

HOW do we know anything? Did you ever stop to ask yourself why you are sure of the various things you are sure about? You would be surprised how tangled and mystified you would get about the most ordinary and matter-of-fact objects and experiences if you started to question them. Some people, you know, do not accept the reality of matter at all. They say that when we strike or touch a table, for instance, there is no table really there. All that is real is our own thought about it.

This strikes ordinary people as very funny. We go along very comfortably and vigorously on the belief that the things we see and hear and touch and experience are real, and see no reason for making our heads ache, and perhaps do worse than ache, by wondering whether they may not be false.

Religious experience can take its place along with these comfortable, solid facts of life. How do you know your father loves you? You smile at that. How do you know God loves you? You are just as sure of that. How do you know that Christ has forgiven your sins? Because he has said so in his Book, and by his Spirit in your heart.

The doctrine of assurance is a very precious one to the people called Methodists. It is a little different from the doctrine of "final perseverance" held by some creeds, which means that when one is converted he can be absolutely sure that he is going to be saved at last. The Methodist knows he is saved now, and knows that if he keeps on believing and obeying God he will be saved for all eternity. But he also recognizes all the time the dreadful possibility of taking himself out of God's hands.

Form the habit of trusting God. It is a delightful habit. The things you believe one day you know the next, and so we may go on gladly and confidently, knowing that we are born of God, and knowing that if we continue to trust and obey him, he will continue to bless and keep us.

If you do not now know that you are saved the way is very simple. Begin by acknowledging your sins. Let God tell you plainly what you have done that is wrong. Then begin to trust Christ. You know he died to make possible the forgiveness of your sins. Hunt out the passages in the New Testament, particularly in Romans, Galatians and I John, which tell of the results to human hearts of the death of Christ. Then simply trust him. Believe that he died for you and that he forgives you now. As you trust him the assurance that you are really his will grow stronger and stronger until you will come to wonder how you could ever have doubted him.

WANTED: Two men to represent us selling the New International Encyclopædia with opportunity for advancement to position of trust and responsibility. Address, DODD, MEAD & CO., 449 Fourth Ave., New York City.

If you will, you can be a successful farmer in the San Joaquin Valley, California

Here forty thousand families have established homes and turned raw land, which cost them $100 an acre or less, into blossoming orchards, blooming alfalfa and stock farms, for some of which, men, who know conditions, are glad to pay $500 an acre and upward.

But there still is ample room and abundant opportunity for one hundred thousand families to make a home and a substantial fortune—from a modest beginning—supplying the ever-increasing demand for the products of California soil.

I want to get into correspondence with every man that reads this advertisement who has a desire to own a farm on the Pacific coast. I would appreciate it if you will tell me in your first letter just what kind of a place you desire—whether a fruit ranch, a vineyard, an intensively cultivated garden, an alfalfa and stock ranch, a dairy or a poultry farm.

We are in possession of a large amount of information that will be of the utmost value to you in deciding where to locate. We can tell you something of land values, terms, market conditions, taxes, cost of cultivation, cost of water and the hundreds of other things which you must know, and which would take you weeks and months to get for yourself.

After you have found the spot, we will send to you one of our expert agriculturists, a man who knows local conditions and can intelligently advise you how to lay out your place and how to avoid the pitfalls the stranger in a new country is likely to encounter. All this service is free. It is the Santa Fe way of protecting the home-maker as far as possible against failure.

The railroad has no land to sell. Its only chance of profit is in the continued success and prosperity of the people it serves.

What the San Joaquin Valley is, and what others are doing here, is told in two books, which are free and sent postpaid for the asking. Then, if you are interested, we want you to ask further questions—we are eager to answer them.

and out of his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword. In various corners of the picture were the seven churches, some of which looked not unlike old New England meeting-houses, while at the bottom of the picture, under the feet of his Lord, lay, like a dead man, the prostrate John. The crude literalism of the painting was most interesting, especially as one viewed it in one of the seven cities to which he wrote who had "in his right hand the seven stars, out of whose mouth went a sharp two-edged sword, and whose countenance was as the sun shining in his strength, and before whom the Revelator fell at his feet as dead."

Ala Shehr rises from the plain through which the railway runs and largely covers the slope of a commanding hill from the top of which a splendid view can be obtained. Between this hill and the Tmolus is a narrow vale, and up the long valley of the Hermus to the table land of Asia Minor the eye is never tired of gazing, so charming is the scene. It was this situation that gave to the Philadelphia of old its importance and its unique interest. This long valley of which it seemed to be the guardian was the "open door" to Phrygia and all the region beyond, and the most striking figure of the sacred message to this church is derived from this thought of Philadelphia as "the open door which no man could shut" to the regions beyond.

Sir William Ramsay designates Philadelphia as the missionary city, because it was established by its founder Attalus II about a century and a half before Christ, to become the center of Græco-Asiatic civilization, to spread the knowledge of the Greek language and customs throughout the eastern part of Lydia where it was situated and far on into Phrygia.

The beautiful name, "Philadelphia," was derived from the founder of the city, Attalus Philadelphus, who was so called because of his marked affection and loyalty to his brother Eumenes. On the ancient coins of Philadelphia are shown the two brothers exactly alike in limb and feature and garb, an identity which symbolized their mutual unity and affection. One of these coins represents them as looking upon the genius of Ephesus as she carries an image of her own goddess Diana toward her temple. This coin was struck to commemorate the alliance of Philadelphia and Ephesus.

Another event in the history of Philadelphia must be recorded before we can fully understand the message of the Revelator. In the year 17 of the Christian era occurred a terrible earthquake. We have already noted how it destroyed the great temple of Artemis in Sardis, built by Alexander the Great. Sardis was perhaps the worst sufferer in this awful cataclysm, but twelve other cities were also largely destroyed. One of these was Philadelphia. Strabo tells us that in some respects Philadelphia was injured most of all, since for several years after the earthquake the earth tremors continued, making it unsafe to live within the confines of the city, so that the great majority of the inhabitants moved away, or established themselves in tents in the surrounding country.

The Emperor Tiberius, who was then upon the throne, provided liberally from the royal treasury for Philadelphia and the other ruined cities, and in memory of his generosity the Philadelphians took another name and called their city Neokaisareia—the new Cæsar. A temple was also built in honor of the emperor, but whether Tiberius or Germanicus, his son, is not quite certain. However, this temple and the new name of the city apparently did not last long; for it soon resumed its ancient name, and the new temple, it is thought, soon fell into decay.

Now we can understand perhaps

If you are weak, therefore, or anemic, nervous or run oow.., a victim of the strenuous conditions of modern life, can you do better than follow such distinguished examples?

Charles D. Sigsbee
Rear-Admiral U. S. Navy, writes:
"After a thorough trial of Sanatogen, I am convinced of its merit as a food and tonic. Its beneficial effects are beyond douht."

Colonel Henry Watterson
The famous Editor, writes:
"I feel I owe it to truth to state that I have made a thorough trial of Sanatogen and that I have found it most efficacious and beneficent. I do not think I could have recovered my vitality, as I have done, without this Sanatogen operating equally upon the digestive organs and nerve centers."

Prof. C. Von Noorden of Vienna University, writes:
"Sanatogen is of especial value in various forms of anemia and general debility. It is an excellent albuminous preparation."

John Burroughs

SPEAKS FOR ITSELF

Experience of a Southern Man

"Please allow me to thank the originator of Postum, which in my case speaks for itself," writes a Fla. man.

"I formerly drank so much coffee that my nervous system was almost a wreck." (Tea is just as injurious because it contains caffeine, the drug found in coffee.) "My physician told me to quit drinking it, but I had to have something, so I tried Postum.

"To my great surprise I saw quite a change in my nerves in about 10 days. That was a year ago and now my nerves are steady and I don't have those bilious sick headaches which I regularly had while drinking coffee.

"Postum seems to have body-building properties and leaves the head clear. And I do not have the bad taste in my mouth when I get up mornings. When Postum is boiled good and strong, it is far better in taste than coffee. My advice to coffee drinkers is to try Postum and be convinced."

more clearly the message of the Spirit unto the church of Philadelphia. He who wrote it was the holy and the true, the One who had the key of David, the One who openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth.

The open door was a familiar metaphor to the Christians of St. John's time. St. Paul used it over and over again. At Ephesus, he tells us, a "great door and effectual is opened." At Troas, too, a door was opened, and the Colossians were asked to pray that God may "open unto us a door for the word of utterance to speak the mystery of Christ." Though the church of Philadelphia has only a little strength no man can shut this door of opportunity. It is interesting to note that no word of even implied censure is spoken to the church of Philadelphia. It shares this distinction with Smyrna alone, and it seems no mere coincidence that these two cities alone of all the seven have maintained continuously the worship of Christ, while the others have at times been given wholly over to the religion of the Turk.

"Because thou didst keep the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of trial," says the Revelator. The Philadelphians indeed knew what the hour of trial was; the terrible earthquake, the ruin of the city, its bad name as an unsafe place for residence, which adhered to it perhaps until the time that this letter was written, the many years when the inhabitants dared not live within the confines of the city but camped out in the open fields; all these memories were fresh at this time and gave new significance to the beautiful promise "to him that overcometh." "I will make him a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go out thence no more." In the new Jerusalem the inhabitant would no longer have to leave an earthquake-shaken city, but he would be established as a pillar immovable in the holy temple, and upon him would be written a new name. On the pillars of the temple dedicated to the Roman emperor was doubtless written the new name of Philadelphia, Neokaisareia, yet neither this name nor the temple on which it was engraved lasted long, but the name in the temple of the new Jerusalem would endure forever.

The later history of Philadelphia was worthy of its early promise and of the cordial commendatory words of the Spirit. It long maintained itself as a Christian city when all the rest of Asia Minor had yielded to the Turk. It endured siege after siege. It was defended with heroic valor by its Christian inhabitants. They endured starvation, massacre, almost annihilation, before, at last, they yielded to the Seljukian Turks toward the end of the fourteenth century. Even the cool-blooded and often contemptuous historian Gibbon is aroused to something like enthusiasm as he contemplates the heroism of the Philadelphians, and we may well close this story of the City of the Open Door with his eulogy:

"In the loss of Ephesus the Christians deplored the fall of the first angel, the extinction of the first candlestick of the Revelation. . . . The circus and three stately theaters of Laodicea are now peopled with wolves and foxes: Sardis is reduced to a miserable village; the God of Mahomet without a rival or a Son is invoked in the mosques of Thyatira and Pergamos, and the populousness of Smyrna is supported by the foreign trade of Franks and Armenians. Philadelphia alone has been saved by prophecy or courage. . . . Among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia Philadelphia is still erect, a column in a scene of ruins, a pleasing example that the paths of honor and safety may sometimes be the same."

Year after year, the buying power of the dollar has decreased. Year after year, the prices of most standard commodities have increased.
The Ingersoll is one of the few exceptions.
The brain that was responsible for the first Ingersoll Dollar Watch has worked all these years to make the Ingersoll a still greater dollar's worth.
Every year has seen the Ingersoll thinner, finer, more elegantly finished, more expensive to make—but still sold at the same price.
Only an article that has the confidence of the public, the widespread reputation and tremendous demand of the Ingersoll, can tell the same story. See for yourself how much your dollar buys in an Ingersoll.

This Full-size Dollar Bottle of Petro Quinine is Yours Absolutely Free of Charge

PETRO QUININE is a hair saver—it is not a perfume. It is about ninety-six per cent. pure petroleum—some quinine is added.

It is not necessary to talk of the beneficial effect of petroleum on the hair—you know it, and any physician will confirm your knowledge. The objections to its odor, its greasiness and general uncleanly appearance are the only things that have prevented the very general use of petroleum as a hair tonic.

PETRO QUININE eliminates all the undesirable qualities of petroleum—PETRO QUININE is crude petroleum refined to a degree that eliminates the objectionable odor—eliminates the greasiness—eliminates the uncleanly appearance, but retains all the qualities that are beneficial to the hair. PETRO QUININE is a clear, clean liquid that will not stain or leave a grease spot.

Why This Liberal Offer on Petro Quinine is Made to You

It has always been the custom of hair tonic manufacturers to present the proof of the merit of their product by printing a long list of commendatory letters. Sometimes these letters are proof and sometimes they are not. In any event, any manufacturer can get commendatory letters.

Knowing the merit of PETRO QUININE by test, we believe that you are the best judge of its value for yourself. What may help another may be of no benefit to you. We want you to learn for yourself just what PETRO QUININE is and what it will do—we can't ask you to invest your money on our say-so. If you know PETRO QUININE will benefit your hair you'll invest your money willingly enough.

So we make you a present of a full-size $1.00 bottle—no strings, no red tape, but an absolutely bona fide present to you. We would like you to tell us just what you think of it, but we leave that to you.

We will not issue duplicate Certificates. If you answered our advertisement in The Christian Herald of October 8th, 1913, do not ask us for another Certificate.

Here's How You Get the $1.00 Bottle of Petro Quinine Absolutely FREE!

Just write to us for a Certificate (sending us the name of your druggist)—we'll send you one by return mail. Take the Certificate to your druggist—he is authorized thereby to give you a bottle of PETRO QUININE absolutely Free. We pay your druggist the full retail price of $1.00 for the Certificate you present. We're rated in Dun's and Bradstreet's, so he'll know we're reliable.

You must tell your druggist about this offer.

OUR MAIL-BAG

NOTICE

THE editors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be glad to answer any question addressed to THE MAIL-BAG *provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Questions and Answers

S. P. C., Collinswood, Ohio. Should a poor man tithe his income when he has a large family, outstanding debts, and a salary not large enough to meet the demands of his creditors, and when his wife is opposed to tithing? The question eauses strife and contention in the home. When one feels that he has been called by the Holy Spirit to tithe his income, should he do so regardless of wife, creditors, or anything else?

The question of tithing has been frequently discussed in the Mail-Bag, but your letter brings up further points of special importance. Let us take your last question first. When one has been called of God to do anything, he must do it regardless of all other possible considerations. But we must be sure it is God's voice, not any fancy or mistaken idea of our own. In this case it seems to us that the husband is right and the wife mistaken. You speak of other creditors, but God is a creditor, too. A very large per cent. of the people of the United States are in debt. Surely, it would not be right for them to stop all payments to the church and to charity till they are out of debt. While they and their families are getting the benefits of the church they ought to pay their church dues just as they pay their taxes and their rent. Your creditors would not expect you to neglect to pay for the food which your body needs; they should not expect you to neglect to pay for your soul food. Remember, however, that a tithe is required not on the gross earnings or income, but on the "increase." Certain fixed charges may be deducted before the earnings are tithed. What items are to be included in this deduction, as well as all tithing, must be left to the enlightened conscienee.

M. Mack, Fort Bragg, Calif. There have been many theories concerning the identity of the "lost tribes," but none is convincing. Attempts have been made to identify them with some of the races in northern Europe, and, again, with a colony of Jews which has been found in the remote heart of China, adhering to the ancient Jewish religious eustoms and usages. We do not believe it can be successfully contended that they were identical with the aboriginal inhabitants of this country.

G. M. M., Earlham, Ia. The Goshen of early Bible times was a lower Egyptian province lying on the eastern side of the Nile and extending (as is supposed) from what is now known as Lake Menzaleh on the north to the mountain range sixty miles southward. It has not been possible to definitely identify the boundaries of the ancient Goshen. It should not be confused with the other and later Goshen in Southern Palestine, which was probably so named in remembrance of Egypt. You will find the topography of Egypt in the time of the Exodus set forth in the maps contained in all teachers' Bibles, and fully described in any good Bible encyclopedia. It is too long a subject to be dealt with in the Mail-Bag.

L. W. M., Mount Healthy, Ohio. What commandment is the greatest in point of importance?

When the Pharisees asked: "Which is the greatest commandment in the law?" Jesus replied: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul and with all thy mind. This is the first and greatest commandment, and the second is like unto it. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Matt. 22: 36-40.

W. H. H., Ambler, Pa. The passage of Eph. 6: 12 about "spiritual wickedness in high places" is more accurately translated "the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places" (the air). Pride and presumption were the sins by which those evil spirits themselves originally fell from heavenly places (see Isa. 14: 12-15), and they are the special sins to which they tempt others.

T. K. J., Moriah, N. C. Please tell us something about the following writers: (1) Epictetus; (2) John Ruskin; (3) Henry Van Dyke.

(1) Epictetus lived at the beginning of the Christian era, dying about 138. He was a Stoic philosopher and a slave. His teachings are known through the notes of his pupil Arrian, grouped in two books, the Encheiridion, or Handbook, and the Discourses. His philosophy is noble and beautiful, and closely approaches the teachings of Christ. (2) John Ruskin, born 1819, died 1900, was an English writer, critic, teacher and philanthropist. He wrote chiefly on art and architecture, but was a teacher of high ethical and social ideals. He was for some time a professor of fine arts at Oxford. He became greatly interested in the problems of the poor and did much for their uplift. (3) Henry Van Dyke was born in Germantown, Pa., in 1852. He became a Presbyterian clergyman and was later professor of English literature at Princeton. He has written many volumes, both of prose and verse, his works having high literary and inspirational value.

J. Baumgarten, Holton, Kan., writes denying the statement of an Atchison correspondent that "water sold at five cents a glass in the stores of Holton during the recent dry spell." He adds: "It is true that our water system here in the city furnished water for fire protection only for a while; but our wells furnished plenty of water for domestic purposes, and no man or beast suffered for the want of food or water at any time. Our people are prosperous and happy and abundantly able to survive the recent dry spell."

J. J., Baltimore, Md. 1. Dwight L. Moody died in 1900. 2. The illustration to which you refer was used by Moody in a sermon on Rom. 3: 22—"There is no difference." He illustrated the great and universal truth that all have sinned by describing an archery contest in which a man shot ten arrows at a mark. Not one arrow hit the mark. Another archer shot ten and all went straight to the mark save the last arrow. Moody's point was that no man ever lived who kept all the commandments. All have come short of perfect obedience.

S. D. A., Oakfield, N. Y. The passage in Rev. 8: 1 about "silence in heaven" is taken by commentators to indicate the great hush or pause that marks the interval between the opening of the last seal and the reading to the assembled multitudes of God's plan of redemption. "It is the solemn introduction to the eternal Sabbath rest," writes one interpreter, "commencing with the Lamb's reading of the book, heretofore sealed." The pause, writes another commentator, "implies the adoring expectation with which the blessed spirits and the angels await the unfolding of God's judgment."

J. E., Hot Springs, Ark., writes: "We were ordered out of Mexico the first of last July; left nearly everything behind us. I have taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a great many years; stopped it last March, because I could not get it in Mexico. The natives around Valles and Los Platanos are in distress. There have been soldiers quartered there until the natives living there have gotten a man from the United States to write to us telling us they had nothing to eat but black beans and the heads of the wild palmetto palm. How long the poor natives can live on it the good God only knows. We sent some money to them a month ago. A man who lived in Tampico said he would take it to them, but thought it dangerous. The natives are a fine class of people, considering the way they have been wronged."

Miscellaneous

M. C. S. Brun, Saratoga, Calif., writes to say that the verses, "A garden is a lovesome thing," etc., concerning which a reader in Columbus, Miss., inquired, are from a poem by Charles Edward Brown.

P. W. H., Anna, Ill. The quotation "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb" is from Laurence Sterne, an English author, who puts it in the mouth of one of his characters in his book The Sentimental Journey.

For the information of several readers, we would state that Rev. Dr. S. V. Leech, author of Recognition, Love and Immortality in the Celestial Life (extracts from which we recently published), may be addressed at the DeSoto, Washington, D. C.

F. S., Atlanta, Ga. On the continent of Europe it is customary to put the date thus: "10 October, 1913;" whereas, in the United States it is usually written "October 10, 1913." Both are correct; it is simply a matter of prevalent custom.

M. C. S., Oswego, N. Y., writes: "I asked for the words of a certain hymn in THE MAIL-BAG. Letters came to me from all parts of the country and from people in every station in life. It was wonderful and indicated an immense circulation. The mail carrier told me I should have had a postman for myself alone."

M. S., Ovid, Mich. We have no right to sit in judgment on others, and when some people censoriously announce that a misfortune which befalls a person or a community is "a judgment" of God, they assume undue authority. We are distinctly warned against judging others. See Christ's teaching on this subject. Luke 13: 4.

Reader, Benson, Ill. We believe Mr. Westinghouse is a Presbyterian and Mr. Edison a Methodist. The address of the former is Westinghouse Building, Pittsburg, Pa., and of the latter Menlo Park, Orange, N. J. They are very busy men at all times, and can give little time or attention to outsiders. Push your own plans; if you think they are worth, consult a good patent attorney.

THE PAINTED CORRIDOR IN THE MADURA TEMPLE

Through ANCIENT TEMPLES of MADURA

BY BESSIE E. HARVEY

AN ANNUAL HINDU FESTIVAL IN MADURA

MADURA may be a little known name to one who has never been to India, but to the missionary or the tourist it suggests a place of intense interest. It is situated in ‡ district of the same name and lies about 350 ›les south of Madras and about a hundred miles rth of Cape Comarin. It is sometimes known as ‡ "Athens of South India," and claims for itself history of over two thousand years. Though nasties have changed it has held its place through ›st of them as the center of the religious, intellec- al and political life of this part of India. It is mous for its huge Hindu temple, the largest and ›st typical in southern India. The place has still larger interest, for it is the seat of a wide and ficient mission work under the American Board. n my way from the hills this year I had the privi- ge of seeing at my leisure the various sights of the wn.

A building that dates back to the seventeenth ntury is Tirumala's Palace, built by famous king of the Nayakkan line. nly a small portion of the original ructure remains, but to the visitor ven this seems quite an imposing ile. It consists of two oblong halls ading into one another and a court ı front which is filled with plants. he architecture is strangely Gothic nd the great stone pillars that sup- ort the roof rise to a height of forty eet with pointed arches at the top. ı number of domes enter into the tructure of the roof, and there is nuch ornamentation in stucco and arving. The beauty of line is broken o some degree by the unsightly par- itions that have been erected to allow he building to be used as municipal ffices, but they say all this is to be lone away with soon and the building ept as an historical relic. A "friend t court" secured for us permission to o up on the roof and from this van- age ground we got a splendid view f the whole city. The things that tood out most prominently were the our "Goparams" or pyramidal tow- rs of the temple, a line of huge brick olumns to which the king's elephants sed to be tied in early days, and the teeples of the Anglican, Congrega- ional and Catholic churches.

From the palace we went to the emple. As this building covers twenty- ive acres, it is quite a walk to see ven those parts that are open to European inspection. I have already mentioned the goparams. These stand at the corners and are elaborately carved with illustrations from the Hindu pantheon and mythology, but they are so high that one cannot see much of the detail without the aid of a glass, and I have my doubts as to the "game being worth the candle."

As we entered the temple enclosure I was reminded of the entrance to Shwey Dagon Pagoda in Rangoon, for in both places the court of the temple is filled with those that buy and sell—and with those that beg. One needs to see the Orient to really appreciate the local color of such Bible narratives as the cleansing of the temple and the healing of the man that lay at the Gate Beautiful.

In the Madura Temple, as one leaves the bazaar section about the first thing that greets the eye is an image of Ganesa. He has an elephant head, which is accounted for by the legend that his father got angry with him once and cut off his head, but his mother made such a fuss that he was given Jumbo's head as a substitute. He is the god of good luck and is a much seen and much worshiped deity in South India. We wandered about the different shrines and courts, now paying a visit to the sacred elephants, again stopping to look at some series of mythological pictures, and so on. In one place we entered the Hall of a Thousand Pillars, noted for the architectural beauty of its pillars and the skill with which the figures are carved thereon. To me it seemed like a forest of stone with ugly dryads caught and chained on the outside of their tree homes. The entrance to this hall is guarded by the symbol of Siva, a huge stone bullock. In one place there were a lot of images of the bloodthirsty goddess Kali and other horrible idols, and here there were numerous worshipers. I saw elsewhere a pillar of pure gold, that is, covered with gold, but I could not find out its history. Those who know say that the temple, though constantly added to since the sixteenth century, has a definite plan, but to a casual observer it seems a conglomerate of rooms, corridors and porches. In the center, in front of the shrine of the goddess Minatchi, for whose worship the temple is principally built, is the Golden Lily Tank. There are no lilies now, but only dirty, green, slimy water, in which the faithful love to bathe.

THE TEMPLE OF MINATCHI AT MADURA

About the temple loll many lazy-looking, half-naked Brahman priests. Some are reading, but the majority, like the Buddhist priests at Shwey Dagon, seem to be merely loafing. I suppose, though, they'd call it meditating. Dirt is everywhere, and the fine carvings lose much of their charm from this fact. But, alas! dirt is peculiarly Oriental, and I suppose ought to add to the charm—if we Westerners were only not so fastidious!

The house in which the collector of the district lives is quite an interesting building. It is known as "The Tamakam" or summer-house. It was built by the same king who constructed the palace, and the same effect of pillars and domes, though on a smaller scale, is seen in its architecture. Much of the building, however, is modern.

Another work of Tirumala is the Teppakulam "tank" or artificial reservoir. It is square, measuring a thousand feet on a side, and is the

OPPORTUNITY IN THE PHILIPPINES

AS VIEWED BY BISHOP CHARLES H. BRENT

AN OLD STYLE FILIPINO HOUSE

FILIPINO CHILDREN AT WORK IN THE FIELDS

THE AMERICANIZED FILIPINO H E

YOU ask me to give in one sentence the key to the situation in the Philippines. The Moros are the only Mohammedans under the American flag. In this fact lies both our chief responsibility and our opportunity. The challenge of Islam is fairly before us. Shall the Crescent or the Cross rule these distant island wards of ours?

Three hundred and fifty thousand Mohammedans of Malay stock, Arabian tutelage, piratical instinct, and with scant respect for any civilization except their own depraved code, are now under cover of the Stars and Stripes. Also occupying the Moro Province and territory adjacent are perhaps 150,000 pagans who formerly were terrorized and subjugated by them. Never had this nation such a test before. All our patriotic feeling, religious impulse, and zest for moral victory should be stirred to prompt and eager action.

The Moro is by nature aggressive. His prowess, daring, mental shrewdness and manual skill put him far ahead of most men of Malay origin. He has characteristics which when properly trained will be an asset to civilization. He is a man of action rather than an idler. The only way to convert him is to convert his energies, to teach him the joy of productivity, and so to inspire him with self-respect. This we plan to do by teaching him to build roads, railways, bridges, houses, to market his crops and improve his land, to lead in our modern sport instead of his ancient piracy, to develop himself and his resources in normal, ideal, beneficial ways.

Here is a man's mission—religion expressed in work. It would be futile at this juncture, except in unusual circumstances, to preach to the Moro. The history of his race has been such as to close his mind to Christian appeal. We must live our Christianity with him. The hospital, the school, the playground, must be our pulpit.

This work is only begun. For every Moro partially civilized, a hundred are still wild, lawless, diseased and vicious. Their religion teaches them that to die in killing a Christian is to win high rank in heaven. Therefore we must gird ourselves to slow conquest, and perhaps in so doing risk the fate of our brave fellows who from time to time in the past decade have gone to death from the Moro onslaughts. But the debasing elements of a new civilization are fast running into the islands, and thousands of these wards of ours with unbridled appetites and passions will soon be debauched, unless a Christianizing influence reaches them first. We must act now; delay means inevitable disaster.

Our program includes chiefly hospitals, dispensaries, trade schools, home helps, and social service features. I have consulted the governor of the Moro Province and received his hearty approval. He writes me that our success with the modest hospital we are conducting in Zamboanga has moved him to plan for similar hospitals at Lake Lanao, Cotobato and Jolo—three most important centers of population and two of antagonism. He asks our co-operation in organizing these hospitals.

The headquarters for our medical work will be at Zamboanga, the capital of the Moro Province, where a permanent building is now being erected. The methods of the social settlement will largely prevail, and it is our desire to co-operate with existing agencies such as the public schools and the health department, in order to do our work to the greatest advantage. The site for our buildings consists of five acres on the sea, with a cocoanut grove on the property already yielding a small revenue (we try always to consider economic aspects, and thus put our work on the most efficient basis).

In Basilan we have applied to the government for the purchase of sixty acres of good farming land, where we purpose starting an agricultural experiment station, industrial schools and a dispensary.

The commanding city of Jolo will be the next point of attack. Jolo is the capital of the Sulu group of 50,000 Moros, among whom are the so-called "irreconcilables" of the Philippines. Winning Jolo, we have won the Moro Province. In Jolo resides the Sultan of Sulu, head [illegible] Mohammedan faith. Is it too m[illegible] hope to convert even him?

The central aim is this: to place [illegible] Moro child under the direct guardi[illegible] of an American child, or group of [illegible] can children, or of parents and ch[illegible] The Moros are the national wa[illegible] America; the Moro children should be the [illegible] vidual wards of individual Americans, and h[illegible] have the personal touch in the formative [illegible] that no nation, however great and good, ca[illegible] part. The national guardianship is merely po[illegible] —the personal guardianship will be social, i[illegible] trial, educational, moral.

Letters and photographs may be exchanged [illegible] tures and samples of handiwork sent fron[illegible] Moro land, bulletins of progress published at [illegible] vals, moving pictures employed to delineate [illegible] childhood and growth, plans and ideas offere[illegible] American boys and girls for their small b[illegible] neighbors—in short, a close, keen, sympathetic [illegible] lifting friendship be established from which [illegible] the child too little civilized and the child too [illegible] civilized will be the gainer. The details of [illegible] plan I am leaving to Bishop Samuel Fallows, w[illegible] experience as founder of the Harmony Clu[illegible] America qualifies him peculiarly to aid in har[illegible] izing the East and the West. He will act as c[illegible] man of the national committee.

An experience of a lifetime in altruistic [illegible] proves this to me; here in the Moro Provinc[illegible] have a duty and a responsibility unequaled [illegible] where in the world; here the bodies, hearts, m[illegible] and souls of half a million Mohammedans [illegible] pagans can at once be reached, inspired, empowe[illegible] as nowhere else; here a nation is being born a[illegible] nowhere else; here our work lies, as nowhere [illegible] Here I expect to serve while I live, and here I l[illegible] you will join me with your prayers, thoughts, g[illegible] and efforts on behalf of these great yet chil[illegible] peoples, whom we alone can protect, heal, [illegible] guide and educate for service.

The foregoing is here reprinted through [illegible] courtesy of the Harmony Club, an organiza[illegible] which is backing Bishop Brent's Philippine w[illegible] Bishop Fallows is forming a national advis[illegible] committee for the purpose of organizing the w[illegible] outlined in Bishop Brent's article. Its he[illegible] quarters will be at No. 30 Church Street, N[illegible] York. The Harmony Club was founded four y[illegible] ago, and has already 2,000 members in the vari[illegible] States. It is proposed to have a still wider me[illegible] bership, and to enlist the co-operation of a la[illegible] section of the American people in the effort to [illegible] claim the Moros and make them good citize[illegible] devoting special attention to the training of [illegible] children. Only 1,000 Moro and pagan children [illegible] of an estimated total of 300,000 now under [illegible] flag are being educated at the present time. largest stone-built tank in the southern part of the country. The whole is surrounded by granite walks and parapets with a wall around the top and flights of steps leading to the water. In the center is an island built around with granite slabs. On this are temples and many beautiful trees. The whole effect is very striking, especially at sunset. Legend has it that Tirumala was conducting excavations of clay for bricks for his palace in this place when the workmen dug up the image of a certain god, and the king built this tank in that deity's honor. Once a year the god has a festival of lights there, but the rest of the time the place is open to the public and is used as a place for an occasional outing or picnic by the European residents.

The American Board has had a mission in Madura for over seventy-five years. I believe they have at present four churches in the city itself, one at each gate of the city. The Sunday I was in Madura I attended the Eastgate Church, the oldest of the four. Here was gathered a typical South India Christian congregation, and I enjoyed seeing them, even if I could not understand much of what went on, since it was in Tamil. To me the most interesting thing was the special musical number. About thirty little school children rose and sang most sweetly the Tamil rendering of Dr. Witter's well-known hymn, "Come, Sinner, Come." Alin[illegible] next door to the church is a fine hospit[illegible] for men principally, known as the Albert Vict[illegible] Hospital. A MACEDONIAN SHEPHERD LEADING HIS FLOCK TO SAFETY

MACEDONIAN REFUGEES IN A TEMPORARY CAMP IN THE DUBNITSA VALLEY

"THE WORST WAR IN 200 YEARS"

CORRESPONDENTS TELL OF THE SAD CONDITIONS IN THE BALKANS TO-DAY

PASTOR LYLE D. WOODRUFF, an American missionary in Bulgaria, who has labored as a volunteer worker in the relief camps, paid a flying trip to the homeland a few weeks ago. On the occasion of a visit to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices, Mr. Woodruff, who is a representative of the American Board (Congregational) told a tragic story of present conditions in the Balkans as the result of the war. He was the first noncombatant to enter Adrianople after it had been captured from the Turks, and was chairman of the committee in charge of the relief work among the Turkish prisoners for six weeks. He said: "The haven of distressed Macedonians is Bulgaria. There they find welcome, food and shelter. But Bulgaria is poor, and every town has its own people impoverished by the war. At Dupnitsa they are told to go to Samokov. This hungry city sends them down into the villages of the wheat belt. The little bonfires of the refugees line the road with lurid patches of still life in the night time. In the morning they move on or turn back, or wait in equal hopefulness. In Sofia they are gathered in school buildings, temporarily vacant. The villagers are afraid to house large groups on account of possible cholera.

WOMAN GOING TO WORK IN THE FIELDS

"On the road I met well-dressed men and women as destitute as those in peasants' garb. Whole groups of women come, each with a baby bound on her back, and little ones trudging alongside. I saw poor mothers nursing babies as they walked. Six days they had traveled. Many sickened and died by the way. In fording the swift Struma, many children were drowned. Scarcely a band of pilgrims coming up out of the stream but some children were missing. I met these Macedonians on the mountain when the cold rain beat down. I have cared for them in the cholera camp when heat and hunger made them easy victims of the deadly germ.

"A woman with six children came to the edge of the cholera yard, begging that the men be sent to bring her husband, who had fallen on the road. Two hours after his arrival he was dead. Women were brought in with babes beside them on the stretcher, or the little children running beside it. They said that all that did not flee were killed, but death by sword or cholera may be better than the fate of those who survive.

"Macedonia is laid waste," he continued, "from the Ægean to Razlog, and her towns and fields are burned. As the result of two wars, Bulgaria exchanged the Dobrudja (Good Lands) for a bit of Macedonia and a part of Thrace and acquired a war debt, a crippled and depleted manhood, and 150,000 refugees. Thus the nation liberated from the Turk in 1877 at San Stefano, divided into three parts by the Treaty of Berlin, is finally united—in the bonds of common misery.

"In Bulgaria 150,000 refugees say they cannot return to Macedonia. Queen Eleanor wants to secure means to establish them in the strip of Thrace saved to Bulgaria after the Turks' return to Europe.

"The responsibility for the war of the allies is with the great Powers of Europe. Now the relieving of that suffering is the duty of the civilized world. Thousands of innocent men, women and children are at the mercy of conditions over which they have no control. They are Catholic and Protestant, Mohammedan and Greek, Jew and Gentile. The 150,000 in Bulgaria are only a part of the problem."

A letter from P. B. Kennedy, sent through the care of the Austrian consulate at Durazzo, Albania, dated October 8, says:

"May we not justifiably join in the prayer, 'How long, O Lord?' for the murderous warfare continues. I came here from Elbasan to appeal to Ismail Kemail Bey, our provisional president at Avlona, for the deed for our Krasta property which the Turkish Government forcibly took from us. He claims that the property belongs to the present Albanian Government because our agent received back from the Turkish Government the purchasing price, 500 liras.

"Since being here the news continues to come in of terrible bloodshed. The Servians, in vacating some villages which were in acknowledged Albanian territory, took the opportunity to steal some sheep and in doing so shot the protesting shepherds. This led to a panic, and the whole Dibra district, inhabited by 80,000 people, rose against the Servians. Their guns had been collected both by the Turks and the Servians, but some had hidden arms in the ground, and others gained them from the Servians. The women fought with clubs and axes! Mrs. Kennedy and I recently visited part of this district, but the Albanians seemed to be unarmed and in a starving condition. They had become desperate in waiting for the boundary to be settled when they could again earn a livelihood.

"The Servians returned with 60,000 soldiers, and in a spirit of revenge attacked the remaining villages with three battalions of cannon and machine guns. I have a carefully prepared list of houses burned in each village and people killed, which I obtained in Tirana while meeting with the local government's commission, which was distributing bread to the starving yesterday. Gostiva district, 1,008 houses burned and 2,280 killed; Reka district, 1,245 houses burned and 3,785 killed; Kaza district, 432 houses burned and 5,412 killed; a total of 3,185 burned homes and 11,477 Albanians slain. A war of extermination! Other districts are to be heard from. The fighting continues.

"I was told of the Servians crowding women and children in homes and then surrounding them and burning them alive. I saw dear little children who had walked six days! Some died on the way. Day by day they are crowding into Elbason and Tirana. There are 20,000 in Elbason now, and 15,000 in Tirana. To save these from starving is the first duty of the hour."

Professor Samuel T. Dutton of New York, a member of the International Commission to study the causes and effects of the Balkan War, stated in an article in the New York Times on October 14 that when the commission had concluded its work and made its report, it would shock the civilized world. Charges and countercharges have been made by both sides regarding responsibility for the atrocities. Professor Dutton says: "It was found that many persons high in authority in their respective countries knew very little of what the armies were actually doing on the field of battle. We had to listen to countless accusations and replies. It is hoped that some influential people in the Balkans will see that war is not the best means of settling a question of boundary. They will sooner or later recognize that all have met losses that can never be made good. No nation will be spared in the report and the awful facts will speak for themselves."

REFUGEES FLEEING TOWARD THE RILO MONASTERY

Mr. Dutton's article concludes: "I am sure the world will be amazed that nations calling themselves Christian can, either through anger or greed, commit such barbarities on their fellow men. Certainly there has never been a war in two hundred years in which the combatants fought with such ferocity, and never was an event so unnecessary and so uncalled for as the war in which those standing side by side in the struggle to drive the Turk out of Europe began to rend each other and to use every known process of extermination and devastation. An estimate of the havoc may be made from the fact that there were 200,000 Turkish refugees driven from their homes and 100,000 Bulgars."

THE SOURCES OF GOODNESS

A SERMON

By

Rev. A. H. C. Morse, D.D.*

TEXT: "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." I John 4: 11

THE starting-point of religion is not with man but with God. Nor is religion itself a human achievement, but a divine bestowment. That which we know of God is not a matter of human discovery but rather of revelation.

It is well to keep this simple truth in mind, for many false notions exist. It has been said that Christianity is only "a splendid synthesis," a more or less successful attempt to piece together the scattered thoughts of men concerning themselves and their relations to a world unseen; and that Jesus was only a great explorer in spiritual things, whose discoveries constitute a sort of new world in which men are attempting to live.

Away with such folly! The idea is entirely wrong. It puts the cart before the horse—the effect before the cause. The Bible is not a history of man's search for God, but rather of God's revelation to man. The burden of its message is not what man has thought concerning God, but what God has thought toward man. The source of all goodness is with God. I once saw a juggler pretending to be an Eastern sage. He said that, in the shining Persian land, they could do impossible things; that they could fling the end of a rope far up in the sky and then ascend the rope. That may be done before man can build up a stairway by which he can ascend to God. "The way" must be let down from on high. The Saviour must become flesh and dwell among us, and the Holy Spirit must be given to dwell within us. The New Jerusalem comes down from above, and every good and every perfect gift is received from the Father of Lights. It is not in our strivings, nor yet in our faith or love, that we find the starting-point of the true religion. Salvation is not from within but from without, and we are saved, primarily, not because we love him, but because he loves us.

The Source of Love

This is a truth "writ large" in all the Word. In his Gospel, John speaks of himself as "that disciple whom Jesus loved." But why did he not say "that disciple who loved Jesus"? It would have been also true. He wrote as he did because the thought that brought strength and gladness and assurance to his heart was not his love for Jesus but Jesus' love for him. "Herein is love." Where? Because we love him? That would be like a child catching the sunlight in a reflecting mirror, and then shouting for joy, "Why, here is the sun!" It isn't the sun at all. The sun is a heavenly thing.

So it is with love. We have seen some splendid instances of love in home and church. But the fountain of love is not here. When I think of the love of the saints, when I think of the ancient apostles, when I think of missionaries whose tales of service are told, and of the martyrs who have yielded their lives, "of whom the world was not worthy," when I think of these things I rejoice in the love of the saints for their Lord. But this is only a streamlet, while I am looking for the springs of the deep. I ask, "Where is the spring of the waterfloods?" And you point me to a favorite pond among the hills, all rimmed about with flowers. And I smile and ask "What is this little pond to the oceans that chafe their shores, and are drawn upon by the energy of the sun to fill the darkening clouds?" That is where the rivers have their source, out there in the original ocean and up there in the strength of the sun. I ask you to point to the fountain of love and the source of all good, and you point to a pool in the Christian heart. I know that is love, and I know it is noble. But who can mention it in the presence of the ocean of love in the heart of God? That is the exhaustless source of all good, wherever it is found in the universe. "We love," says this same apostle, "we love him because he first loved us." Remember this vital distinction: We have love, and that is wonderful. But God is love. And when that is said, it sweeps a circle that includes everything else that can possibly be said of God.

Not only is this true of the source of the Christian life, but it is also true of its practice. "I make known unto you," wrote the apostle, "I make known unto you the Gospel which I preached unto you; for I delivered unto you first of all"—that you should seek God and imitate Christ? that ye should believe the Beatitudes and practice the Golden Rule? Not so. But "I delivered unto you, first of all, how that Christ died for our sins." Why, the Bible is concerned, in the first place, not with the duties of man but with the doings of God. Human duties are made very plain in the Scriptures, but they have not the first place. The Gospel is not good advice but "good news," and it tells us not primarily what to do, but what has been done. Before the apostle tells man to love God and serve him, he tells us how God has loved man and redeemed him.

"How that Christ Died for Our Sins"

Turn to the Acts of the Apostles and see how the apostles understood the Great Commission. They were told to go to the ends of the earth and preach the Gospel. But they did not teach only the Sermon on the Mount, nor exhort people to follow the example of Christ. With one voice they made known and magnified the glory of God revealed in the death and resurrection of Jesus, of which they were the witnesses. What God had wrought for men, that was their Gospel. And what men must now do in the love of God, that was their precept. And there is no Gospel that can ever be preached that will be worth its words that does not begin where the apostles began, "how that Christ died for our sins."

I confess myself mastered by this high theme. Who is there that can measure that which no plummet can ever sound? I am speaking of the love of God, which is an ocean so boundless that it has no shore; so deep that its bottom cannot be found.

But the love of which we speak is a love that takes cognizance of sin and determines to sweep it away. Of course it does. The love that does not care whether its object is good or bad—that isn't love. What do we think of a parent who does not care whether his children are good or bad? We say he is unworthy, ignoble and weak. Can we argue from man to God? The attitude of heart that cares nothing for moral character is not love but cruelty. God cannot treat sin as though it were no sin, and therefore we read this text: "He sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." The dam which we built up between ourselves and the river of water of life he sweeps away. He has dealt with that, and now he is free to deal with the soul apart from that ancient barrier.

I have seen men stumble at this point—over the idea of a God who required sacrifice; as if this were wrong in the Judge of all. I do not pretend to be wiser than others. But one or two things I know. That God required it is true, for he is just and holy. But he found it in himself. He is both the Reconciler and the Reconciliation. "Oh, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord, and who hath been his counselor?"

The Active Love of God

In the light of these things it seems strange to find one like Matthew Arnold finding fault with such evangelical truth as I am now trying to teach. He complained of Calvinism because man is so passive and God so active; that there is so little man does and so much that God does in the actual fact of salvation. He complains of Methodism for the self-same reason. But as the late Dr. Dale has shown, Matthew Arnold's conflict is not with Calvin nor with Wesley, but rather with Paul and the New Testament. This which he urges against our Gospel is its glory; this it is which makes it tidings of great joy. This is the thing that makes our Gospel to differ from all other religions. They insist upon what man must do in order to win the love of God, while our Gospel proclaims what God has done in order to win the love of man.

The student of comparative religion sometimes draws up a table of parallel columns. In one column he puts down certain recorded sayings of Jesus, and over against these he enters certain sayings of Confucius or Buddha or some other of the world's great teachers. And when he looks at these columns he becomes confused, and he wonders if there is, after all, so much that is distinctive in the Christian faith, or if the day will come when he will have to concede that Jesus was only one of a score of wise world teachers. But listen! He need not fear. There is one entry in the first column that is not found in any other: "His own self bore our sins in his body on the tree." Now run the eye down all the other columns, and see if you can find anything like that. This is the Saviour's glory, and no man can take it away from him. Others can tell men of a love they owe to God and of a devotion they ought to lay at his feet. But he alone can tell of a love they can build upon because it antedates all other loves. How can we put into the language of men the wonders of things like these? And there was no cause why God should love us, and no constraint upon him, except that of his own heart—the simple fact that he was God. Other men may publish a more elegant Gospel than this, but no living man and no shining angel can publish a Gospel that is higher and greater.

These things being so, then what shall we do? Simply this, which Jude enjoins: "Keep yourselves in the love of God." That love is about us like the sunshine, and we are just to keep ourselves therein and rejoice. We do not have to create the sunshine, nor even to call it forth. It cannot be won by importunity, nor merited by hard endeavor. It is here with each passing day. So it is with the love of God. It is here for every one, and we have simply to live therein.

The Wealth of Our Gospel

In the study of Euclid there are first some fundamental demonstrations, and then below them the corollaries that grow out of the greater problems. It is even so in this text. "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." And our love to each other is simply God's love to us overflowing. I one time saw a great fountain, from which the water leaped into the air and fell into a circular basin which filled and poured over into another basin farther down, and that again into a third, and a fourth and a fifth, far down through a pretty park. But the lower basin was full because the one above overflowed; and that again because the one above was more than full; and so on, back to the fountain. And the fountain itself leaped high into the air because it drew its energies from a reservoir high up in the mountain.

Here then is the good of the world. Men just now are stirred with a social gospel. They have impulses to help each other. They are vexed at poverty; distressed because some people are poorly housed; and demand a larger wage for those who work. That is all very well, and I hail it as a hopeful sign. It must be that the love of God is surging in the public soul. It is when we feel the love of God that we also love each other. The social gospel, then, is good, provided it comes from a heavenly source. The Gospel at the first was social. "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me because he hath anointed me to preach good tidings to the poor."

But the source of this Gospel is high. And the love of God in our hearts will be just the same as that in God's heart. Nor can we pick and choose and devote ourselves to those who are particularly respectable.

Religion is only good to be given away. No; I do not mean just that. But my own religion only remains sweet and good when it is given away. Bottle it up, and it spoils. And the love of God is only sweet in my life when it is passed along to others. If you were superintendent of the great water works by which the city is supplied, and you found one pipe into which the water poured at one end, but gave out none at the other, you would take that conduit out. You'd say that pipe did not suit your purpose; for you want pipes that will give out as well as receive. That is precisely what the Lord wants of men. And if one just wants to enjoy his religion; to sit and be solaced in the love of God, while others get along as best they can, and let the heathen world go to the dogs, do you know

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, November 16. Psalm 116: 5-16. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." When Mr. Choate gave up the English ambassadorship, he stated at a farewell banquet in London that the only reason for his resignation was "homesickness." He wanted to be home! And there are tired pilgrims in the troubled way of life who, at the end of the day, are homesick, and turn eagerly to the Home and their Father's house. And here is the gracious word of the Book that the Father is homesick for their coming, and is waiting with divine impatience for their arrival at his door.

Their death is "precious in his sight." It is not some indifferent commonplace, which counts for nothing. It is a notable event, much regarded, and heaven is all astir to receive the looked-for children into the family fellowship. It is this which transfigures death. The saint does not move forward into deepening shades of loneliness, but into the raptures of an expectant company, and into the love-welcome of the Father's heart. The death which seems so worthless on this side is "precious" on the other; God is making up his jewels, and he is adding one more gem to his resplendent crown.

MONDAY, November 17. Numbers 27: 18-23. "Take thee Joshua, in whom is the Spirit. What can we do if the spirit be absent? Of what good is a pianist, however perfect her technique, if the spirit of music has no place in her soul? Of what good is a singer, however thorough her training, if it is all lip-sound, uninspired by the breath of the Spirit? Spirit makes all the difference between mechanism and life, between the gramophone and the person, between a metal diaphragm and a soul. We may have the finely articulated bones of bodies, but it is only the inspiring breath that changes them into an army.

When men and women have the Spirit, God's work can be done. We can get on without learning, we cannot get on without inspiration. A man with one talent and the Spirit can do infinitely more than a man with ten talents without it. A frail wire, plus the electric current, can do more than massive cables without it. And yet we go on multiplying our wires and neglecting the current. We pile up organizations and neglect the Spirit. And little or nothing is done. "Take thou Joshua, in whom is the Spirit." That is the first thing God looked for; for it is the prime necessity of a powerful and efficient life.

TUESDAY, November 18. Deuteronomy 31: 14-23. "Moses gave Joshua the son of Nun a charge." This was experience talking to inexperience. It was the witness of yesterday offering itself to the man of to-day. It was the old explorer giving his findings to the man about to undertake new explorations. Let me thank God for the message of history, for the lamp of guidance which has been forged by the events of the past. Let me thank God for the veteran who comes to me out of old battlefields, and who tells me how great battles have been lost and won. Let me thank God that I do not begin my day as though yesterday had never been. It pours its stores of counsel and warning at my feet, and I start with a rich inheritance. Moses, the old leader, has precious wisdom for Joshua, the new one.

Sometimes the new Joshua resents the old Moses and brushes him aside. He shuts his eyes and ears to the findings of yesterday, and with blind obstinacy he takes his own course. It is a road abounding in pitfalls, and he has no friendly lamp, and he will surely stumble into error and confusion. "Ask now of the days that have been and they shall tell thee." "And I heard a voice behind me." Let Joshua pay heed to that voice; it is the voice of history and experience.

WEDNESDAY, November 19. Joshua 1: 1-9. "Thou shalt meditate therein day and night." Why should Joshua so meditate in "the Book of the Law"? Because by meditation we get the heart of a thing. Memory may give us the letter; it is only meditation that will give us the spirit. We may know all the words of a poem and yet know nothing of the holy place where its genius dwells. The shy spirit of a great poem is something like a shy bird, it only comes out as we watch long in perfect stillness. And so it is with the law of the Lord; a swift, rushing reading gives us nothing; prolonged meditation introduces us into its mood, and we have fellowship with the spirit in which it was born.

Nowadays there is too much reading and too little thinking. We run about over wide surfaces, we do not descend into any depths. We know the letter, we are strangers to the spirit. One saying of the Lord, meditated upon, will yield more inspiration than a whole chapter read at a gallop. We talk of "doing" things! We "do" Rome in a couple of days. We "do" the English Lake District in a few hours. We "do" much and we "see" nothing. We read much and we do not enter "the secret place of the Most High." "Be still and know that I am God."

THURSDAY, November 20. Romans 8: 31-39. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" Who else is worth naming? How much does anybody count? If the sun be on my side why should I be dismayed at any icy obstacle that may rear itself in my way? Sun versus ice! God versus my impediments! Why should I fear? If the atmosphere is on my side, then even the opposing strength of iron will rust away into powder. "The breath of the Lord bloweth upon it"; and if the holy Breath, God's Holy Spirit, is for us, then the apparently invincible obstacle will crumble away into dust.

But we are deceived by mass and we are forgetful of spirit. Mere size affrights us. We are dismayed by numbers. We forget the quiet, pervasive, all-powerful ministry of the Spirit of God. We are overwhelmed by the phenomena of tempest, and earthquake, and fire, and we forget that almightiness hides in the "still, small voice," in "the sound of a gentle stillness." God's breath is more than the fierce threatenings of embattled hosts. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" I will hide myself in his holy fellowship, and "none shall make me afraid."

FRIDAY, November 21. Psalm 18: 31-39. "He maketh my feet like hinds' feet." I think of Wordsworth's lines, in which he describes a natural lady, made by nature herself.

> She shall be sportive as the fawn
> That wild with glee across the lawn
> Or up the mountain springs.

And it is this buoyancy, this elasticity, this springiness, that the Lord is waiting to impart to the souls of his children, so that they may move along the ways of life with the light steps of the fawn.

Some of us move with very heavy feet. There is little of the fawn about us as we go along the road. There is reluctance in our obedience. There is a frown in our homage. Our benevolence is graceless, and there is no charm in our piety, and no rapture in our praise. We are the victims of "the spirit of heaviness." And yet here is the word which tells us that God will make our feet "like hinds' feet." He will give us exhilaration and spring, enabling us to leap over difficulties and to have strength and buoyancy for the steepest hills. Let us seek the inspiration of the Lord. "It is God that girdeth me with strength and maketh my way perfect."

SATURDAY, November 22. Ephesians 6: 11-18. The Word describes the armor, and it directs us to the armory. The description would oppress me if the directions were absent. If I had to forge the armor for myself I should be in despair. But I can go to the armory of grace, where there is an ever-open door and abundant welcome for every person who fain would be a knight-errant of the Lord. The Lord will provide me with perfect equipment, suitable for every kind of contest which may meet me along the road. There are no favorites among the pilgrims, except, perhaps, the neediest, and to them is given "more abundant honor."

Sometimes one of the Lord's knights loses one piece of armor, and he must at once repair to the armory. Perhaps he has lost his helmet, or his shield, or even his breastplate, and the enemy has discovered his vulnerable place. We must never continue our journey imperfectly armed. The evil one will ignore the pieces we have, and he will direct all his attack where there is no defense. Back to the armory! Back to the armory, that we may "put on the whole armor of God." The Lord is waiting; let us humbly and penitently ask for the missing piece.

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913

what is the matter in that life? The pipe is clogged up. That man is of no use in this age, and so far as I can see he will be of no use in any other age. The system of love-supply requires open pipes, through which the love of God can freely pass. What a world this would be, if every one caught this thought! What a city this would be if we could only live for each other! What places our homes would be if we but received this noble spirit! Do you know what will make heaven restful and sweet? Just this: That each shall be devoted to the other, because all will be devoted to God.

You have read Ian Maclaren's account of the transformation of Lachlin Campbell. His daughter Flora having no mother went astray, and wandered into a far country. One day in the session of the little kirk, Lachlin arose and himself made the motion that Flora's name be stricken from the church. Later, Margaret Howe went to call on Lachlin in his home, and she found Flora's plants set in the sun, and the father tenderly watering them; and one that was ready to die he had sheltered from the wind with his plaid. They spoke of Flora, and Lachlin took Margaret into the cottage and showed what he had done. With his own hand he had scratched Flora's name from the family Bible. But Margaret could see that the hand that had held the pen had trembled, and the ink had run as though it had been wet with tears. She wrote to Flora, bidding her to return, and telling her that her father loved her and mourned for her. And that very night, Lachlin took some books and built them into a stand near the window, and set a lamp thereon; and every night the light fell upon the steep path that led to Flora's home. And one day she came; and again the old Bible was brought out, and Lachlin told her what he had done. "Give me the pen," said Flora; and when Lachlin looked, this is what he saw: "Flora Campbell, missed April, 1873; found September, 1873. Her father fell on her neck and kissed her."

Yes, but the love of God is broader than the measure of man's mind. No father ever missed and waited for his child as God misses and waits for us. He has a book in which our names are written; and the prodigal's name is there too. And whenever he comes home there is welcome also for him.

This then is the wealth of our Gospel. This is the source of our good. We love God, and that is splendid; that is the joy of salvation. But He loves us, and that is the strength of salvation. And we are saved, not by the love that we feel, but rather by the love that we trust. And that is His. I cannot preach a higher Gospel than this.

W. C. T. U. URGES REFORMS

THE INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION IN BROOKLYN, N. Y., PASSES RESOLUTIONS ON REFORM MOVEMENTS OF THE DAY

THE closing sessions of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union in Brooklyn, N. Y., were replete with interest both for the membership of the organization and for the world at large. The sessions of the convention were attended by throngs of delegates, and the discussions covered a range of subjects and a vastness of territory such as could come only before an organizations of international proportions and importance. The officers for the ensuing period of three years were elected at the closing session of the convention. Rosalind, Countess of Carlisle, of Castle Howard, York, England, was re-elected president of the international organization despite the protests of ill health made by her daughter, Lady Aurea Howard, who represented her mother here. Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens was re-elected vice-president, though she was nominated for the higher office. The English and Welsh delegates placed Mrs. Stevens's name in nomination and voted for her for the presidency. They were outvoted, however, by the other delegates.

Mrs. Stevens expressed her delight over the turn of events and stated that she was willing to accept the office of vice-president. She made a strong speech in favor of the re-election of the Countess of Carlisle, even against her wish, saying that she herself would not accept the presidency, even if elected. "There is no reason," she said, "why the president should do any more work than the vice-president. I believe that it is for the best interests of the organization that we should go on as we have. We do not wish the world to think because we started here that the United States is all there is to it." The other world's officers, honorary secretaries, Miss Agnes E. Slack, England; Miss Anna A. Gordon, United States; and treasurer, Mrs. Mary E. Sanderson, Canada, were re-elected with most of the national superintendents for the ensuing term.

At the suggestion of the delegate from the State of Alabama, Congressman Richmond P. Hobson was made a life member of the organization and tendered a vote of thanks for his activities in introducing an amendment to the constitution, prohibiting the importation and sale of beverages containing alcohol. In recognition of his support $100 was voted from the treasury of the Women's Christian Temperance Union as a contribution to Mr. Hobson's campaign funds.

The committee on resolutions placed its report before the convention and urged the passing of resolutions on the following subjects: constitutional prohibition, arbitration, equal franchise, the white slave traffic, and the state regulation of vice anywhere in the world. The convention opposed the employment of barmaids as is the custom in England, and an amendment to the resolution on that subject urged the prohibition of the sale of liquor on any seagoing craft.

After a long and rather more heated discussion than usually takes place at such a convention, a resolution was passed asking the General Convention of the Episcopal Church to take action to have the fermented wine used in its communion service replaced by unfermented grape juice. The discussion covered not only the wording of the resolution but the general propriety of sending it at all when the other denomination with whom the same custom obtains could not be addressed in the same manner. Some of the English delegates, being strongly conservative, opposed the entire proceeding. The resolution was passed, however, and sent to the Episcopal General Convention, which was then holding its final session. Word was returned to the temperance women that it was too late for consideration at the present session.

In the reports on patent medicines the situation in America and in Canada was fully discussed and the progress made in those countries highly commended. It was also disclosed that the condition of affairs in England was far from good. Evidence was produced to show that unscrupulous chemists were willing to sell certified analyses at five dollars apiece. The problem of food values and proper nourishment as an aid to temperance was considered, and careful study and wide publicity on the subject was strongly urged. During the sessions of the convention congratulations and regrets at not being able to be present were received from President and Mrs. Wilson and many others, among them college presidents, doctors, and women prominent in many different walks of life.

THE NINTH TRIENNIAL CONVENTION OF THE WORLD'S W. C. T. U. IN SESSION IN THE ACADEMY AT BROOKLYN, N. Y.

"THE INSIDE OF THE CUP"

A REVIEW OF WINSTON CHURCHILL'S BOOK, BY PROF. W. H. T. DAU

THIS title of Mr. Churchill's latest novel was suggested by the sixth woe which our Lord denounced against the Pharisees in Matt. 23: 25, 26. His rebuke was directed against external ceremonialism, legal purity, against that scrupulousness which seeks punctiliously to preserve correct forms of worship, a pious exterior, a letter-orthodoxy, while it scorns every genuine spiritual motive for its actions, and actually denies the power of that godliness the forms of which it espouses. The Lord's woe is hurled against those who "steal the livery of heaven to serve the devil in." It is an arraignment of religious hypocrisy.

When a writer of fiction, who has won a good deal of well-deserved fame by his previous productions, takes up this sentiment of our Lord and weaves it into an entertaining story, he bids fair to become a servant of that righteousness and sincerity which Christian pastors and laymen throughout the land are laboring and striving, by the grace of God, to achieve for themselves and their fellow Christians. On its face the novelist's effort promises to be co-operative with the active forces of the Christian religion, and, therefore, enlists for him the cordial and sympathetic interest of the best elements in every Christian church.

Thousands of Christians who have read Mr. Churchill's book are now asking themselves the question: Is Mr. Churchill really fighting that hypocrisy which our Lord fought, and which we have fought before ever this novel of Mr. Churchill was written, and which we shall continue to fight? This question we must answer in the negative.

1. Mr. Churchill has overlooked the fact that our Lord's indignant review of the practices of the Pharisees begins with these words: "The Scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: all therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do: but do not ye after their works: for they say, and do not." Our Lord acknowledges the authority of the Scribes and Pharisees to teach what they teach after Moses, and the correctness of that teaching. Our Lord finds no fault with their doctrine, in so far as their doctrine reproduces the teaching of Moses. For that doctrine was given by God. That was Scripture truth. "And the Scriptures cannot be broken." Nobody, the Lord declares, can with impunity reject the teaching of the divine revelation on the ground that the teaching organ, or the teaching institution, is ungodly. You may denounce the ungodly organ, or body, but you cannot denounce God's truth.

Mr. Churchill has not shown this nice discrimination which we observe in our Lord. His hero, John Hodder, the rector of St. John's Church, justly arraigns the unrighteous business methods and practices of his parishioners Parr, Ferguson, Landon, and others; he justly rebukes the pampered ease, luxury, and security of the wealthy and worldly men and women of society whom he numbers among his flock. But alas! Mr. Hodder also casts aside clearly revealed truths of the Scriptures: the virgin birth of our Saviour, the divine law of marriage and divorce, the divine law of private ownership, and gives to the Apostles' Creed an explanation which dissipates the Scriptural meaning of that ancient symbol of Christianity.

Mr. Churchill, then, has not cleansed the inside of the cup, but he has smashed the old cup, and presents to us a new cup in the place of the old one. The religion which his hero evolves is not proclaimed from "Moses' seat," that is, it is not built upon what holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Spirit, is not founded upon the authority of the apostles and prophets, but is the product of his own fancy. Mr. Churchill's indictment is not only directed against the insincere and inconsistent practices of nominal church members. In this every Christian is with him. Mr. Churchill not only warns the church that the unrebuked and unremoved offenses of church members are the ruin of the church and the byword of the churchless multitude. In this every Christian agrees with him. But Mr. Churchill has also rejected the teaching of God's Word. For this every Christian pities him.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

The Author of "In His Steps," Etc., Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

A group of friends are gathered in the library of Rev. Henry Maxwell, pastor of First Church, Raymond, on the anniversary of the day when they had taken the pledge to make "What Would Jesus Do?" the test of their daily lives. In the group are Virginia Page and Richard Stanton, Mr. Maxwell's new assistant. They are all commenting upon a marvelous light which has been appearing in the sky, when Martha, Mrs. Maxwell's maid, enters the room with the exclamation: "Jesus is here!" She declares that he came to the service of the Rectangle Church, a mission founded by First Church, and had gone home with Mr. Grey, the pastor. Mr. Maxwell calls up Mr. Grey by telephone and is informed that the strange Guest is now asleep in his home. Mr. Grey himself comes to the Maxwell home, and relates the details of Jesus' visit to his church. All discuss the probable attitude of the press toward Jesus. Jasper Carter, editor and proprietor of the Evening Gazette, is intent upon a sensational story, and sends his best reporter, Barnes, and a "cub," Logan, to get the facts and photographs. Both men expose plates, but can get no results. Barnes is almost convinced while writing his story that this is Jesus. That night Virginia Page and Rachel Page, her sister-in-law, are in Virginia's home. The conversation turns upon Mr. Stanton and it becomes evident that Virginia is unusually interested. Mr. Stanton comes in a few moments later and secures Mrs. Page's consent to sing at the remarkable service which takes place in Mr. Maxwell's church the following morning and at which Jesus addresses the people. Barnes, the reporter, announces his conviction that "this remarkable person is Jesus." Several more attempts are made to secure photographs, but without result. Jesus calls upon Jasper Carter, talks with him for an hour, and leaves him a manuscript to read. A conference between Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Grey is interrupted by a telephone message from Rachel Page, announcing that her daughter is very ill. Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Grey reach the Page home just in time to learn that the little girl has died. Jesus is sent for.

CHAPTER V.

THREE days had passed and Rachel and Rollin stood side by side at a grave. The coffin was just being lowered. As the top of it sank to a level with the grass it left the lilies there as if they were growing in that spot. Rachel, with Rollin's arm about her, leaned upon him. At the head of the grave stood Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Grey, and Virginia was near, but next to Rachel stood the figure of the Man.

Rachel turned her eyes up to Him, as Mr. Maxwell finished reading the service:

"Now the God of peace, who brought again from the dead the great Shepherd of the sheep with the blood of the eternal covenant, even our Lord Jesus, make you perfect in every good thing to do his will, working in us that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen."

He stood there, tears on His face and yet — and yet —as Rachel looked—

She recalled his coming into the room, how she fell at his feet and besought him to give her back her darling—and—all that followed—

What was it all?

It mingled with her whole sense of life's mysteries—this thing called death. What was it he had said?

"Would she and Rollin lose all their faith in a heavenly Father unless Eloise were brought to life? Did their faith in him rest upon his answer to this one petition, or did it rest upon something more vital and fundamental? If he were to say he did not use his power to bring the child to life on account of reasons they could not now understand, would their faith be shattered? Or would they accept even death as a part of the human life and go on to live their lives even more strongly and beautifully on account of it? One thing he could promise—that no cloud of doubt would ever obscure their vision of Eloise alive and happy in a world far above this one in joy and beauty. Of that they would always be assured."

And there were other words spoken which blended into all the rest more or less vaguely in Rachel's heart and mind. But the main thing, the sharp, distinct fact, remained. Eloise, her child, was dead. Jesus had not brought her to life. Why? Why? Was he then not real? Was it not Jesus after all?

But no; Rachel found herself, even in that most heart-breaking moment of all funerals—when the coffin holding what she held dearest was sinking down into the ground—even at that moment, as she looked up at him, she did not doubt. Jesus was there by her side. She believed in him. Her faith was triumphant. The tears had come to her relief. Through them she saw her friends, she saw her husband with whom she was passing through their first great sorrow—and irresistibly again and again she returned with her thought and her look to him, yes, to him, who for some good reason had denied her heart-breaking appeal and had not performed a miracle for her sake.

When the service at the cemetery was all over and Rachel and Virginia and Rollin and Dr. West and Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell had gone together to Rollin's, Jesus was not there. Mr. Maxwell did not know where he was, and his mind was in a tumult over his sudden disappearance. But to his amazement and the wonder of Rollin and all the rest, Rachel seemed to understand, and her whole bearing was that of calm and even joyful confidence.

"YOU'RE ONE OF THOSE WHINING, SANCTIMONIOUS PREACHERS, 'HOLIER THAN THOU'—"

She was holding the boy Frank in her lap and saying to Mr. Maxwell:

"I do not have any doubt of his character, his person or his wisdom. My heart is at rest for Eloise. Do not fear for me. My mind was distracted; Jesus has comforted me. Oh, I begin to see how it is possible for some things to surpass even death and its blows. Yes, I believe in him wholly. Eloise is alive and happy. I asked him to give her back to me alive. He is doing more than that. He is making me certain that she is alive in a better world than this."

"Mr. Maxwell," said Rollin, while tears flowed over his face, "do you hear that? And yet—what is Jesus' teaching about disease? Did he not heal when he was here before? Will he not do the same now?"

Mr. Maxwell bowed his head, troubled in thought.

"I must confess my faith in Jesus is somewhat shaken. I really thought when he came the other day that he would perform a mighty work. I cannot understand why he did not. But concerning his power over disease, do you not remember, doctor, what he said to us yesterday and the day before?"

Dr. West spoke eagerly.

"Yes! His general attitude toward disease will be that the world is learning how to control and eradicate the causes of disease by finding out the reasons. For him to heal a few diseased people would be a small thing compared with directing human energy and research toward the causes of human suffering and finally removing them. And that, as I understand him, is going to be his attitude toward the whole problem of disease."

"All that would not hinder him from healing suffering people, and he may do that," Maxwell said, still troubled, as he looked at Rollin and Rachel and remembered their grief. "Dearly beloved, what can I say to you? Surely, in all this mystery of death and life, even for the little children, God's love is going to be revealed to us."

"I do not question his love," Rachel answered bravely. "I did at first. But Jesus has comforted me. I do not question his wisdom or his love. Somehow I feel that his coming will mean to the world vastly more than the bringing to life again of even our dear one." And Rachel laid her face down on the boy's fair head while her tears fell, but they were tears of faith, not of despair or bitterness.

"Where do you suppose he can have gone?" Maxwell asked in a low tone of Grey.

"I do not know. He returned with me as far as my house. You know I have asked the privilege of having him with me to-night. But when I turned to go in with him before coming up here, he was gone."

There was silence among the friends. Even the solemn and awful stroke of death had not been able to lessen their tremendous interest in this coming into their homes and their lives of Jesus. His every act and word, his daily plans, his future plans, his attitude toward all the varied interests of the human life around him were fascinating to them.

Yet even while all that was true, as Mr. Maxwell said, speaking with wondering interest, Raymond was already beginning to accept his presence as if it were almost a commonplace. As the news of his coming had gone out over the country, a general wave of curiosity and inquiry was pulsing into Raymond, and among the distant churches and ministers his presence was hardly realized. Only a small number of people had as yet heard him speak. Mr. Maxwell had arranged a conference with all the churches and pastors, which was to be held the next day in the First Church. Deep interest was being shown in this, and Mr. Maxwell was busy every moment answering calls, making inquiries about this meeting. He himself was anticipating it with keenest wonder at its probable results. But within the last two days his faith had been shaken. This person calling himself Jesus, who had moved the people so wonderfully in the church Sunday and at the outdoor service, was walking the streets of Raymond like an average man, attracting no special attention, talking with every one indiscriminately, playing with children, entering into the commonplaces of Raymond like any common man; and when a supreme test had come to show a real power, he had failed; or at least he had refused to exhibit anything which could distinguish him from others. Was he really Jesus? Where were the signs and wonders?

Mr. Maxwell, searching his own feeling, going over every word and act of the Man, could not call up one single thing that did not somehow belong naturally to Jesus. Neither could he detect one single weakness or fault in him. And while he wavered in his judgment of some things he had observed, he was staggered as he viewed the calm courage and unshaken faith of Rachel and Rollin.

All this only made him the more eager to see and know more of the Person who had in less than a week become the one absorbing object of his heart and mind.

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

The Mexican Situation

IN HIS recent public utterances, President Wilson has made it clear that our policy in dealing with Mexico does not aim at territorial acquisition, but is solely directed toward the recognition of the principle that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Speaking before the Southern Commercial Congress in Mobile, Ala., on October 27, the President made use of these significant words:

Comprehension must be the soil in which shall grow all the fruits of friendship, because there is a reason and a compulsion lying behind all this which are dearer than anything else to the thoughtful men of America; I mean the development of constitutional liberty in the world. Human rights, national integrity, and opportunity, as against material interests—that is the issue which we now have to face.

I want to take this occasion to say that the United States will never again seek one additional foot of territory by conquest. She will devote herself to showing that she knows how to make honorable and fruitful use of the territory she has. And she must regard it as one of the duties of friendship to see that from no quarter are material interests made superior to human liberty and national opportunity. I say this, not with a single thought that any one will gainsay it, but merely to fix in our consciousness what our real relationship with the rest of America is. It is the relationship of a family of mankind devoted to the development of true constitutional liberty. We know that that is the soil out of which the best enterprise springs. We know that this is a cause which we are making in common with them because we have had to make it for ourselves.

Our neighbors in the southern republic were entitled to an honest election, but conditions rendered this impossible. Only a small proportion of those entitled to the franchise dared to vote in the face of military intimidation, all the election machinery being under Huerta's control. Further, the official canvass can only record the dictator's choice, not that of the people. Even should Huerta keep his pledge to decline the presidency and step down in favor of Blanquet, he will still be able, as head of the army, to effectually oppose liberty and progress in the republic.

What will be our next step, under such conditions? England, France and Germany have signified their readiness to co-operate with us in any concerted action, but will take no steps that might embarrass this government, should we desire to handle the situation alone. Our naval force in Mexican waters has been strengthened, and should developments in the near future call for the adoption of new methods in assisting the Mexican people to decent government, the re-establishment of order and an honest election, they will be taken in no hostile spirit. We have no quarrel with our southern neighbors, but it may become our duty to help them to help themselves and so restore peace and security to the misgoverned republic.

Lloyd-George and Land Reform

THESE are history-making days for the people of England. British conservatism, already shaken by the movement for stripping the House of Lords of its ancient prerogatives, is now called to endure another and still greater shock by the far-reaching land reform scheme outlined by Chancellor of the Exchequer Lloyd-George in a public address on October 22. In that speech, which is understood to have been delivered with the full approval of his associates in the cabinet, he pronounced the land system of the United Kingdom a total failure. In a country which is compelled to import foodstuffs very heavily each year to supply the wants of its population it is an anomaly to have millions of acres of good, fertile land lying fallow or used only as game preserves or for private parks. It has been estimated that nearly 14,000,000 acres are now kept from tillage, and as a result, urban industry is degraded while the wages of farm laborers are down to a point that makes life a hopeless struggle without a prospect of betterment. This system, which is a relic of feudalism, deprives thousands of workers of employment and robs the nation of its most valuable asset. The chancellor pointed out that in no other country in Europe is so large an area of land devoted to sport and private pleasure, and that the very presence of the game itself is a menace to the farming sections, which it overruns and injures. In little more than a generation, the number of agricultural laborers in the United Kingdom has been reduced by 600,000. If prosperity is ever to be regained, this idle land must be put in commission, the idle labor employed and the farmers given better chances for a decent living.

His advocacy of the resumption by the state of the control of all land monopoly points the way to one of the greatest reforms in English history. On the principle that what the crown originally gave out of the public domain it can take back again, the proposed land legislation may be made to affect a large proportion of the holdings of the 700 landowners who now hold the great landed estates in England and Wales and also of the seventy or more proprietors in Scotland. No definite plan has yet been announced, but it is foreseen that it will probably include the abandonment of the right of absolute ownership wherever unused land is needed for the agricultural welfare of the country. Chancellor Lloyd-George has more than hinted that the ancient law of entail—which has tied up large estates from generation to generation, keeping them in the direct line of succession—must be abolished. Many of these estates have been held since the Conquest. Such a far-reaching reform as he now proposes will doubtless meet with strong and powerful opposition; but England has set its face in the direction of democratic progress and the new movement of "the land for the people" is one which may be expected to cut a wide path through the jungle of ancient privilege.

After the Turmoil

THERE is a palpable sense of relief, now that the political campaign is over. People are glad that the hurly-burly is ended, the rancor and vituperation silenced, and the ugly epithets, which flew about as thickly as the falling autumn leaves, are no longer heard. United States Senator William E. Borah, who was an interested observer of the campaign in New York, has given a picturesque characterization of the pandemonium that reigned in the metropolis during the closing days of the battle. "It would be interpreted by the whole world," he says, "as a travesty on decent popular government." Denunciations filling the air and the newspapers; judgeships bought and sold; justices auctioned off, as political offices were disposed of under the hammer from the Roman ramparts. It isn't a pleasing picture for thoughtful Americans to contemplate. Such is the degradation of State and municipal government in New York under boss rule—a spectacle and a warning to the whole nation. And now that the end is reached, the corruptionists vanquished and both sides silent through sheer exhaustion, the average citizen may well ask whether it is not possible by way of change to have a decently conducted campaign. It is a hard saying, but true, that a community gets about the kind of government it deserves. With a free ballot, the smallest spark of patriotism and the application of a reasonable amount of intelligence, the people can rid themselves of bosses and corruptionists. They have swept them out before. And they can do it every time, if they rise up to their work as good citizens instead of allowing, through their own indifference and default, the forces of evil to triumph as they have so often done in the past.

Caring for the Old Minister

IN RECENT years the various denominations of the Christian Church have been giving more thoughtful consideration to the case of the aged members of the ministry who have been laid aside by physical inability or other causes. Churchless, penniless, and well nigh friendless, the lot of the old minister is one that deserves our sympathy. Many a faithful veteran, who has given the better part of a long life to active service in the Gospel, is at sixty-five or seventy left stranded and neglected. This should not be so. But while a few denominations are taking good care of their old ministers, let it be said, with absolute frankness, there are others that are not doing so. We hear of patriarchal preachers who have passed the age of active service and who are engaged in a hard and apparently helpless struggle for existence. When these old saints are overlooked—and we cannot believe it is ever done knowingly—the fault, though one of omission, is none the less a grievous fault. We ourselves know of some deplorable cases of neglected ministers—men who have a stainless record and who have done glorious service in their time—now left stranded and helpless to be supported by the charity of friends. One such case is that of a preacher now almost an octogenarian who, with his aged and invalid wife, is supported wholly through the generosity of a little group of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers.

There should be a liberal endowment by the denominations for the old minister. He is a gracious connecting link between the present and the past, a venerable saint who should be fed and housed and cared for, now that his workday is over. Amid all the changes and trials of life he has been our faithful friend. He may have baptized two generations in the same family, and he has been a comforter in sickness and a wise counselor at all times. In many a home he has set the little feet on the right road at life's beginning, and helped them through the long journey. At wedding or festival he has been the indispensable and honored guest. Our "prophet's chamber" has held no worthier occupant. He has smoothed the pillow of the dying and pointed the way to heaven. Yes, the old minister has "many souls for his hire." Let us honor him and fill his closing years with love and kindness.

"With Many Sorrows"

THERE is a surprisingly strong statement in one of Paul's letters to Timothy. He is talking about people who want to be rich and of the temptations into which they come. Some, following this lure, and going down beneath these temptations, have, he declares, "pierced themselves through with many sorrows."

It is impossible to read the daily papers without thinking some such thought as that. Not only of money-makers, but of many sorts of pleasure-seekers and passion-followers, how true it is that they are being led to a painful, gloomy end! That will be the goal, instead of the bright thing they hope for—a soul which has pierced itself through with many sorrows.

We are apt to get a totally wrong idea of the warnings and invitations of the Bible. Young people, particularly, are tempted to think that God must be an unfriendly, even a cruel Being, to wish to deprive them of their pleasures. It is not so at all. God wants to lead us to pleasure, not away from it. So he tries to woo us from the things that must bring sorrow in the end. Innocent pleasure and hearty work we may, and should, enjoy to the full. But certain pleasures and certain tasks are not of that kind. They have only one end—a soul pierced through with many sorrows.

It is a poor bargain: the lights, the laughter, the thrills, now; the gold, the jewels, the houses and the lands gained by unjust strife now—after that, the sorrow-pierced soul. There is a better way. It is the way of wisdom. God "giveth us richly all things," all things good and pure and kind, "to enjoy." "The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow therewith."

Princeton's New Building Dedicated

THE Graduate College of Princeton University and the Cleveland Memorial Tower, a part of the same building, and its dominating architectural feature, were dedicated on October 22. The ceremonies of the day began with the dedication of the Graduate College. Dr. Francis L. Patton, who preceded Woodrow Wilson as President of Princeton, offered the dedicatory prayer. Addresses of congratulation were made by representatives from abroad, including Dr. Alois Teihl, recently rector of the University of Berlin; Dr. Arthur Shipley of Cambridge, Dr. Arthur Denis Goodley of Oxford, and Dr. Emile Boutroux of Paris. President Murray Butler of Columbia offered the congratulations of American universities. Among other things he said: "We have need of distinction in college life. The world cries out for it. The leveling process has been carried on so far that the proportion of those who are able to serve and to guide their fellows with unusual competence grows steadily less. We must have training in eminence such as the Graduate College proposes." President Hibben called attention to the endowment of the Graduate College in the form of $300,000 in fellowships and the $2,000,000 Wyman fund, which is to be devoted, with the exception of the sum to be spent in constructing a residence for the dean of the graduate school, to the endowment of professorships. The Cleveland Memorial Tower was presented to the university in separate exercises immediately after the dedication of the Graduate College. The presentation speech was made by Richard V. Lindabury, president of the Cleveland Monument Association, who said that the funds for the memorial were contributed by men of all parties and from all walks of life. President Hibben accepted the Tower on behalf of the university, after which ex-President Taft made an address, throwing aside his manuscript and speaking with more warmth than usual. Among other things Mr. Taft said: "Mr. Cleveland was not a great lawyer; he was not a great economist; he was not a great orator; but he was a great President and a great man, and he was these because, with a strong mind, clear intelligence, and wide knowledge of affairs, he had the character, honesty, courage, and sense of public duty which enabled him to meet great and critical issues. Not one of the sister universities can make herself as Princeton can so much a part of history. Two of her graduates and one of her presidents signed the Declaration of Independence. Twenty-one were members of the Continental Congress; forty-three were Revolutionary officers. Her college grounds, where we dedicate to-day, were the scene of an important Revolutionary battle. Of her sons, two have been Presidents, one Vice-President, three associate justices of the Supreme Court, and thirty-four members of Congress." The dedication of the college building, with its Memorial Tower, was a significant event for Princeton and the cause of higher learning in America, and reminds us of the saying of the wise man:

Wisdom hath builded her house, she hath hewn out her seven pillars. (Prov. 9: 1.)

City Mourns Cripple Hero

HIGH honors were paid the other day to Jacob Blitz, the crippled municipal electrician of Wheeling, W. Va., who gave up his life in saving five-year-old Robert Ritizel from being ground to death by a Baltimore and Ohio Railroad train. The flags on the city buildings were displayed at half-mast, most of the municipal offices were closed during the hours of the funeral, and Mayor H. L. Kirk, members of the Board of Control, the City Council, policemen, firemen, and many private citizens walked as an escort for the body to the church. At the hour of the funeral the story of Blitz's heroism was being related to the children in all the public schools of the city. The pessimist who sees nothing good in the people of to-day, who thinks that everything is going to the bad, that we have not now such men as in the brave days of old, needs only to turn his eyes to the many instances of unselfishness and heroism in ordinary life. The cripple was truly heroic in character. He could not bear to see the child killed by the train, and pushed him off the track, but gave his life instead, and a whole city wept for and honored him. His heroism was in imitation of the One of whom it was said in derision, but in supremely significant truth:

Likewise also the chief priests, mocking, said among themselves with the scribes, He saved others; himself he cannot save. (Mark 15: 31.)

Settles Ownership of Porker

A DISPUTE over the ownership of a dead porker was recently decided in a peculiar manner by Police Justice George W. Wolcott of Batavia, N. Y. Hale and Johnson, two friends, bought two small pigs and worked equally in caring for and feeding them. In the course of time one pig died. Each claimed that it was the property of the other that had died. Both men continued to devote their attention to the other pig until it grew up to weigh three hundred pounds. One of the partners killed and took possession of it. The other entered suit against him for theft. The judge decided that the swine should be equally divided between the men and dismissed the case of the criminal charge. If the records of the court costs could be known, it is likely that the half each received amounted to little or nothing. This is a fair example of the childish litigation that engages so much of the attention of our courts. There are numberless petty causes in court that are exceedingly expensive and unprofitable. Estrangements of friendships for life, loss of fortune, or even wars among nations have grown out of misunderstandings as trifling as the one that took the two men to court in Batavia. This incident has in it, by suggestion, some of the features of the one where two mothers appealed to the king to decide which was the mother of the living child and of the one which had died. His decision was not a final settlement, but a means to that end.

And the king said, Divide the living child in two, and give half to the one and half to the other. (I Kings 3: 25.)

Unwelcome Imitation

AN ACTOR in Berlin, Germany, in taking a part in a comic drama recently, made up his features so to resemble Kaiser William that the police ordered him to change his costume and make-up and to cease imitating the emperor in his manner. The player, who was filling the rôle of a grand duke, is said to bear a striking resemblance to the Kaiser anyway, and he so copied the monarch's physical movements and accents that it seemed impossible to distinguish between himself and the ruler. This, it is stated, annoyed the Kaiser so intensely that he ordered the police to direct the change in the actor's costume and reading of his lines. Many citizens of the United States have borne striking resemblances to our Presidents, and all the elected rulers of America have had their imitators in pageant and play; in fact, many of them have been mercilessly burlesqued and held up to ridicule, yet we do not hear of any police interference that is based upon such ridiculous personal pride and self-consciousness. It would be well for our land if more of us made sincere efforts to imitate the great King of kings both in action and in spiritual features, for this is enjoined upon us. Looking steadfastly in faith and love upon Christ we may become like him. The apostle Paul thus refers to it:

But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord. (II Cor. 3: 18.)

Gifts to Medical College

COLONEL OLIVER HAZARD PAYNE has given $4,000,000 to endow the Cornell University Medical College in New York City. This provides $200,000 annually to the college for the establishment of which Colonel Payne gave $500,000 some years ago. The present gift is the largest in the history of the university, and is said to be the largest amount ever given to any medical school in the world. A gift of $1,500,000 to the Johns Hopkins Medical College from the Rockefeller Educational Foundation fund has also just been announced. There is scarcely any department in which greater progress is being made than in that of medical science. Plagues that at one time took away a third of the population of the earth are being mastered. What pain and sorrow have been cured, and how many precious lives have been saved! How commendable for men who have money to turn it into such channels of benevolence, to bless men, and imitate Christ's ministry of physical healing which he wrought as an introduction to the spiritual cures he effected.

And the people, when they knew it, followed him; and he received them, and spake unto them of the kingdom of God, and healed them that had need of healing. (Luke 9: 11.)

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Engraving Bureau's New Home

ONE of the handsomest buildings in the national capital is the new home of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the United States Government. This structure was only recently completed and within the last few weeks occupied by the thousands of employees who produce all the engraved matter used by the government. In this building the plates are engraved and all the printing done for the government currency, government bonds, revenue and postage stamps, and such other matter of a similar nature as may be required by any of the government departments. The most modern machinery and mechanical arrangements have been put in the new building and it is a model for the industrial buildings of the nation. The working conditions are declared to be as perfect as human ingenuity can make them.

Momentous Rate Decision

THE Interstate Commerce Commission on October 28 laid down a significant principle in the matter of railway freight rates. The pronouncement was made in connection with a case dealing with the shipment of potatoes from Oklahoma to the Rocky Mountain territory and supported an increase in rates made by the railways. The commission stated its decision that "if, when viewed in the light of those considerations which enter into proper rate making, a particular rate is fair and just for the service performed, the price at which the shipper markets his product cannot be accepted as the controlling factor in fixing the rate."

This decision means that if, because of an oversupply, or for any other reason, the price falls to a low figure in a particular market, that cannot be considered as controlling the freight rate to that market.

New Jersey's New Governor

IN THE State of New Jersey they have a new governor and a joke. On October 28 Leon R. Taylor, speaker of the State Assembly, was sworn in as acting governor of the State, taking the place of James W. Fielder, the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, who resigned in order to comply with the constitutional provision prohibiting a governor from serving two terms in succession. Mr. Fielder, by virtue of his office as president of the Senate, became acting governor when Woodrow Wilson resigned to become President. Mr. Taylor will serve as acting governor until January, when the successful candidate will take office. Upon becoming governor of the State, Mr. Taylor, who is a young man, found himself commander-in-chief of the New Jersey National Guard, despite the fact that only a few days previous to his taking office he had failed to qualify as a first lieutenant. An outpost problem that is an acknowledged "sticker" baffled Mr. Taylor, and this failure carried his percentage below that needful for promotion. He smiled when his attention was called to the fact that he now commanded the officers who had "plucked" him. His comment was that he preferred vengeance upon the problem itself at a future sitting.

Solving Ireland's Problem

WHAT gave promise of a solution for the grave problem that has faced English statesmen in connection with the enactment of the Irish Home Rule Bill was outlined on October 27 by Sir Edward Grey, secretary of state for foreign affairs. This statement explained that the government was willing to concede to Ulster a sort of home rule within home rule. That province will be permitted to retain control of her own school system, her police system and other branches of the administration of her affairs in which the Protestant population feared the influence of a strongly Roman Catholic parliament in Dublin. It was believed for a time that the Home Rule Bill would be so modified as to omit Ulster, but the later developments indicate that Premier Asquith had no intention of offering such exclusion, either temporary or permanent, when he made the announcement of policy which was so interpreted.

Mexico Votes. Nobody is Elected

THE long-talked-of election in Mexico took place on October 26, but was declared void, as an insufficient number of ballots was cast to make legal the choice of any candidate to succeed General Huerta as president. One-third of about three hundred thousand votes are required to make an election legal. The results throughout the entire country were about in the same proportion as in Mexico City, where only 10,000 out of 80,000 possible votes were cast. The election was carried on very quietly, the streets of the cities being constantly patrolled by cavalrymen. On the day following the election General Huerta decreed an increase of sixty thousand men in the Mexican standing army. On October 28 General Felix Diaz tendered his resignation as an officer in the Mexican army and went secretly on board the United States gunboat Wheeling. He stated that definite news had reached him that he and two companions were to have been shot by General Huerta's orders within twenty-four hours.

That the Powers are contemplating some concerted movement for the establishment of a secure government in Mexico was evinced on October 29 by the authoritative statement that Secretary of State Bryan had received in reply to a formal note the assurance that England, France and Germany would suspend the formulation of a policy toward Mexico until an international agreement could be arranged. Orders were issued for the battleships New Jersey, Nebraska, Rhode Island and Virginia to sail for Vera Cruz and there await orders. It is believed that the mission of these ships will be to enforce an international demand that General Huerta resign his dictatorship and that fair and free elections be held.

The slight unpleasantness which arose between the British foreign office and the State Department at Washington has been entirely dissipated. The whole incident grew out of ill-timed statements credited to Sir Lionel Carden, the British ambassador in Mexico. These statements were denied all authorization by the British foreign office, and the representative in Mexico City has since repudiated the authenticity of the cabled interview.

Colorado Militia in the Coal Fields

THE efforts of Governor Ammons of Colorado to settle the differences between the coal mine operators and the striking miners of the southern Colorado coal fields have proved unavailing and he has publicly announced that the situation must be dealt with by armed force. In his proclamation the governor states that he is compelled to this action, as there is "no other recourse." He says further: "Any one who wants to work will be given protection to go and come in peace, but I will not allow the importation of strike-breakers. I mean to be fair to both sides while enforcing peace and protecting life and property."

The governor's action was the immediate result of a battle which started early on the morning of October 28 between twelve hundred strikers and about three hundred mine guards, and in which three men were killed. The fighting strikers were largely Greeks, who started out with the avowed intention of capturing the mines and holding them against possible military protection. On the 29th and 30th of October, twenty-two companies of infantry were sent into the disaffected district, which was declared to be in a state of insurrection. In spite of the presence of the militia, violence continued on the 29th, though the scene shifted from the coal camps in the immediate vicinity of Trinidad to a point some six miles north. There the office of the Southwestern Fuel Company, in which the local postoffice was situated, was captured and burned by the knocking over of a stove by the strikers. The postmaster declares that the mail was rifled before the building was fired, as opened envelopes were found only half burned. Military law has been proclaimed and orders issued that all strikers and mine guards alike must surrender their arms.

"Suffragette" Prohibited in New York

THE authorities of New York City took steps a few weeks ago to stop the sale there of the Suffragette, the newspaper published by the militant suffragists of England. The publication had been declared unfit for circulation in England and suppressed. It is now published in France. The sale of the papers was started at the headquarters of the Political Equality Association early on the morning after the copies arrived from France. A number of sales had been made, some to people of adult years and others to mere children, before attention of the police was called to the nature of the publication. It soon became rumored that Mr. Anthony Comstock, head of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, intended to bring the matter to the attention of the district attorney. Then the sale of the copies increased by leaps and bounds, morbid curiosity prompting some to buy and others buying to secure souvenirs of an interesting event. Those who visited the salesroom found a number of young girl clerks in attendance, Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont superintending the sale and Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst moving about the office.

Mr. Comstock, after securing full evidence upon which to base a prosecution, said that it was not proposed to have a "sewage of Europe" spread about New York. The articles which have brought the paper under the ban deal with semi-medical questions with the utmost frankness. They are principally from the pen of Mrs. Pankhurst's daughter Christabel, the editor of the paper.

Remembering Their Godfather

ON OCTOBER 22, the city of Keokuk, Iowa, dedicated a statue of the famous Indian chief from whom it takes its name. This redoubtable old Indian was Chief Keokuk of Black Hawk fame. One interesting feature of the ceremony was the presence of John Keokuk, a great-great-grandson of the Indian chief, who had come from his home in Oklahoma bringing a message of greeting and good fellowship from the Sac and Fox tribes of Indians, over which Chief Keokuk ruled in the days of his prime. The bones of the old chieftain were brought from their first resting-place near Ottawa, Kan., and interred under the monument. When the authenticity of the old chief's grave was fully established and the bones were disinterred, it was found that the skull was missing. It required some rather clever detective work to trace it, but it was finally found in a lodge at Ottawa, where it was being used as part of the paraphernalia in an initiation ceremony. The unveiling of the statue was made the occasion of a civic ceremony and was attended by delegations from the daughters of the American Revolution, the Order of the Cincinnati, and many other patriotic societies. The statue, which is one of the very few erected to the memory of Indians in this country, is the work of Mr. Lorado Taft, who was present at the unveiling ceremony. It is of bronze, ten feet in height, and rests upon a base fifteen feet high. On one side of the base is a tablet in memory of the early Iowa trail pioneers.

BRAMWELL BOOTH VISITS AMERICA

WHEN General Bramwell Booth of the Salvation Army is introduced for the first time to a New York audience at Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of November 23, he ll speak as the head of an organization with which has been identified since his early school days. will speak with the authority of one fully cogant of all the important events in the history of movement since he became his father's chief pporter and first aide.

General Booth is in command of 15,000 officers d cadets, and 5,000 employees who have no official nk accept him as their general commander. He o commands, through the delegated agencies, re than 25,000 bandsmen, 10,000 songsters and ,000 local or non-commissioned officers. It must remembered that every member of the Salvation my is a living, active, vital force; in fact, no rson can be a member of the Salvation Army and a drone.

General William Bramwell Booth—William ars to have been dropped from his name early in s childhood because of his mother's fondness for e appellation Bramwell—was born at Halifax, ngland, in 1856. He is therefore fifty-seven years d. He looks neither older nor younger than a man regular habits, who works every available min-e of his life, should. At the time of his birth the alvation Army had not even taken hazy form in is father's mind. The Rev. William Booth was ien a minister of the Methodist New Connexion. ine years later the founder of the Army began his vangelistic work at Mile End. This was the forerunner of the Christian Mission, which "retired" ter in favor of "The Salvation Army."

Although he was quickly chosen as his father's ief lieutenant, Bramwell Booth's initiation into e work was accompanied by discipline as severe s obtains at West Point or Sandhurst. Every oment, except those devoted to rest and worship, as occupied in some kind of work. In the evenngs he preached to howling mobs in the worst sections of London. The natural desire of a Britisher o defend himself against insult, contumely and ctual manual assault he was obliged to repress. obblestones, ancient eggs, elderly fruit, decayed egetables and disintegrating fish were the favorite nissiles of the mob in those days.

BRAMWELL BOOTH

Although the new general has never been in America he is in close touch with everything that is occurring on this side of the Atlantic; he is in constant communication with the officers here. He has always been deeply interested in the progress of the "war," as he terms it, in the United States. Through his sister, Commander Eva Booth, he is kept constantly informed of all the current events in Army circles here. Like his father the new general looks to the United States and Canada for big accomplishments in Salvation Army work in the future.

The late Governor Gardner of Massachusetts introduced the founder of the movement as "The Bishop of the Established Church of the Poor." It might with good and sufficient reason be said that the new general shared the sentiments of his father while he lived and has inherited them from his mother and the founder now that they are in their graves. But his duties are more arduous and exacting than those of any bishop and more complex than those of any general.

Thirty-one years ago the general married. He chose for his wife Miss Florence Soper, the daughter of a Welsh physician. He found in the young bride a helpmeet who was willing to "go to the limit" with him in the propaganda in which he had engaged. She was converted at one of the Salvation Army meetings and was soon preaching on the streets of London and later in Paris.

Sir Rider Haggard once put to Mr. Bramwell Booth certain questions with respect to the future of the Army. These queries were so important and far-reaching in their significance that the then chief of the staff asked for time in which to make a careful reply. As a result, he wrote a most valuable report embodying a large amount of useful material concerning the Army.

He said: "If any one could imagine what it has been for me to stick at its center almost without intermission for more than thirty-five years, receiving continual reports of its development and progress in one nation after another, studying from within not only its strength and vitality, but its weaknesses and failures, and laboring to devise remedies and preventives, until what was a little unknown mission in the East End of London has become the widely, I might almost say the universally recognized Army of to-day, he could, perhaps, understand something of my great confidence."

This is the note that the general strikes with his officers, and will be manifest during his visit to Chicago and New York. With a greater capacity than any one else to recognize the limitations of the movement, he looks forward to the future with a triumphant, all-conquering faith which was characteristic of his father.

THE PRESIDENT PLEADS FOR PATRIOTISM

(See Front Cover)

IN SPITE of a steady downpour of rain, over ten thousand people gathered on Saturday, October 25, to witness the re-dedication of Congress Hall in Philadelphia, the scene of stirring events in the country's early history. It was in this historic building that the Congress of the United States held its deliberations from 1790 to 1800. It was there that the Declaration of Independence was signed. And now, after years of patient effort on the part of architects who have searched every existing record for information regarding its original appearance, the old structure has been made again as it was when Washington delivered there his farewell address to the American people.

President Wilson, accompanied by an assemblage of men of national and international prominence, went from Washington by special train and was given a rousing reception both at the railway station and at Congress Hall. Mayor Rudolph Blankenburg headed the welcoming delegation which accompanied the President to the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel, where a short reception was held and the President took a light luncheon. Immediately after luncheon the presidential party went to Congress Hall and there reviewed a parade of the military and naval forces in and about Philadelphia and the Boy Scouts of the city.

During the dedication exercises President Wilson sat in the chair which was occupied by John Hancock when he presided over the Continental Congress at the signing of the Declaration of Independence. This was the first time the chair had been used since President Grant sat in it in 1876. The desk beside which the President sat was the time-worn piece of furniture upon which the Declaration document was laid for the signatures of the members of Congress.

The President was the last speaker on the program, and his speech was notable as an expression of the American ideal of to-day and for the fact that it contained one striking epigram: "The President who is too intent on re-election is seldom worth re-electing."

On the balcony with President Wilson when he addressed the crowd, or in the connecting chamber, were nearly all the members of the cabinet, Speaker Champ Clark of the House of Representatives, the governors of many States, a delegation of Senators from the thirteen colonial States, the representatives of several foreign nations, and a delegation of the city officials of Philadelphia.

In his address President Wilson said:

"No American could stand in this place to-day and think of the circumstances for which we have come together to celebrate without being most profoundly stirred. There has come over me since I sat down here a sense of deep solemnity, because it has seemed to me that I saw ghosts crowding in, a great assemblage of spirits, no longer visible to us, but whose influence we still feel as we feel the molding power of history itself.

"The men who sat in this hall, to whom we now look back with a touch of deep sentiment, were men of flesh and blood face to face with extremely difficult problems.

"The population of the United States then was hardly three times the present population of the city of Philadelphia; and yet that was a nation, as this is a nation, and the men who spoke for it were setting their hands to a work which was to last, not only in order that their people might be happy, but that an example might be lifted up for the instruction of the rest of the world. Strangers came then to America to see what the young people that had sprung up here was like, and they found men in council who knew how to construct the government.

"They found men deliberating here who had none of the appearance of novices, none of the hesitation of men who did not know whether the work they were doing was going to last or not. They were men who addressed themselves to the problem of construction as familiarly as we attempted to carry out the traditions of the government established these one hundred and thirty-seven years.

"And so I feel to-day a compulsion of men, a compulsion of examples which were set us in this place. And of what do their examples remind us? They remind us not only of public service, but of public service shot through with principle and honor.

"I hear a great many people at Fourth of July celebrations laud the Declaration of Independence who in between Julys shiver at the plain language of our bill of rights. The Declaration of Independence was indeed the first audible breath of liberty, but the substance of liberty, as written in such documents as the declaration of rights attached, for example, to the first Constitution of Virginia, was a model for similar documents read elsewhere into our great fundamental charters.

"That document speaks in terms in the uttering of which the men of that generation did not hesitate, saying that every people has the right to choose its own forms of government, not once but as often as they pleased, to accommodate those forms of government to their own existing interests and circumstances.

"Not only to establish but to alter is the fundamental principle of self-government, so that we are just as much under compulsion to study the particular circumstances of our own day as the gentlemen were who sat in this hall and set us precedents, not of what to do but of how to do it, because liberty inheres in the circumstances of the day.

"Human happiness consists in the life which human beings are leading at the time that they live. I can feed my own mind as happily upon the circumstances of the revolutionary and constitutional period as you can, but I cannot feed my thoughts with them in Washington now because every day problems arise which wear some new face and aspect.

"I must fall back, if I would serve my conscience, upon those things which are fundamental, rather than upon those things which are superficial.

"The very smallness of this room, the very simplicity of it all, the suggestions that come from its restoration, are reassuring things, things which become a man to realize. Therefore my theme here to-day, my only thought, is a very simple one.

"Do not let us go back to the annals of those sessions of Congress to find out what to do, because we live in another age and circumstances are absolutely different.

"Let us be men of that kind. Let us feel at every turn the compulsions of principle and of honor. Let us free our vision from temporary circumstances, look abroad at the horizon, and take into our lungs the great air of freedom which has blown through this country, stolen across the seas and blessed people everywhere.

"Looking east and west, north and south, let us remind ourselves that we are all custodians in some degree of the principles which made men free and governments just."

THE MOST WONDERFUL BOOK*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

"JEHOVAH spake unto Joshua." When a new leader was to be appointed after the death of Moses, God did not seek out the smartest young man, but rather the grandest old man, Joshua. He was only thirty-seven years younger than Moses, and consequently eighty-three years old when God said to him, "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee. . . . Thou shalt cause this people to inherit the land which I sware unto their fathers to give them."

Joshua had a record, because forty years before he had urged the people to go forward despite the report of the ten spies that there were giants in the land, and they would not be able to possess it. One other man among the spies, Caleb, agreed with Joshua. Caleb was about as old as Joshua, and on his eighty-fifth birthday said: "I am as strong this day as I was in the day Moses sent me; as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, and to go out, and to come in." So there were two grand old men in Israel, but God's choice rested upon Joshua. "Only be strong and very courageous to observe to do according to all the law which Moses my servant commanded thee." (Verse 7.) So Joshua's exaltation did not place him above obedience to a higher power, even to the will of God as revealed in the law given through Moses. In treading the path of obedience himself, Joshua could best lead others to obey not only their leader, but God. History furnishes us many examples of tyrannical leaders who have developed turbulent, rebellious peoples. History has also given us some examples of godly men as rulers, such as William I, Prince of Orange, who said, after defeat in battle, "Nevertheless, since it has thus pleased God, it is necessary to have patience and to lose not courage, conforming ourselves to his divine will; as for my part, I have determined to do in everything which may happen, still proceeding onward in our work with his almighty aid." On another occasion, the Prince of Orange said: "You ask me if I have entered into a firm treaty with any great king or potentate, to which I answer, that before I ever took up the cause of the oppressed Christians in these provinces, I had entered into a close alliance with the King of kings, and I am firmly convinced that all who put their trust in him shall be saved by his almighty hand. The God of armies will raise up armies for us to do battle with our enemies and his own." (Quoted from Motley's Dutch Republic.) Perhaps God has chosen some of us for great tasks in life. Let us ask him about it. Let us gird ourselves to do it.

"This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth." (Verse 8.) Thus did God give Joshua to understand that he was to speak as a man of authority not his own words but God's words. "Thus saith the Lord" would be the strongest way in which Joshua could give any command to his people. Let us open our Bibles and see what portion of them Joshua was commanded to have upon his lips. Let us take between our fingers that part called the Pentateuch, which contains the five books of Moses. In these books were written 613 laws given to Moses by God himself, teaching the people how to be honest and kind to each other, how to live and what to eat, so that they might have good health; how to deal with criminals; how even to treat sons who were disobedient and disrespectful to their parents. And most of all, some of the laws were to teach the people how to love and serve God. Some of us, perhaps, have thought that God gave only the ten commandments; they are the most important of those given through Moses. Many of the others were given especially for the Hebrews. Moses, under God, had been the embodiment of law, and Joshua was instructed by God to keep up the succession.

The Bible has grown since the days of Joshua. It is almost six times as large now as then. The New Testament is about the same size—a little larger than the Pentateuch. We have not only more Bible than Joshua had, but we have a more precious Bible, because it now contains the life of the Lord Jesus on earth and his words.

"Thou shalt meditate therein day and night." Joshua was to keep an open Bible. We have seen a picture of the new leader sitting in his tent beside a light on a table, poring over the Bible, not in the form of a book, but a roll, for in Joshua's day the Bible was not printed on pages and bound into a book, but it was written by hand with a reed pen on strips of parchment or skins many feet long, which had to be unrolled as they were read. Joshua may have copied this roll for himself, or it may have been done by scribes, whose duty it was to copy the Scriptures. The command of God that Joshua should meditate on the Scriptures day and night came after the injunction to keep the law upon his lips. If he had become so familiar with the Scriptures that he would talk in Bible language, why was it necessary that he should continue Bible study? There are three reasons for this:

First, because the Bible is an inexhaustible mine from which man to the end of his days can obtain new treasures. Daniel Webster, who was so familiar with the Bible through daily reading of it from childhood that he was called "the United States Senate's walking concordance," said of the Bible: "There is more of valuable truth yet to be gleaned from the Sacred Writings that has thus far escaped the attention of commentators than from all other sources of human knowledge combined." And so, day by day, as Joshua meditated upon the Book of the Law, the fruitage upon his lips of God's words grew larger and sweeter.

Second, God told Joshua that meditation on the Book would make his way prosperous and successful. We will let the Psalmist tell us how this could be: "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto according to thy word." More light upon this point will be gained by reading Psalm 119. It is the longest psalm, having 168 verses. Let no one, therefore, be deterred from reading it, and it will be best done at one sitting. It is a marvelous setting forth of the power of the Bible to make a success of life. Notice, while reading it, the ten recurring names given to the Bible: Way, word, truth, law, statutes, judgments, precepts, commandments, testimonies, and ordinances. The whole psalm is set forth as "meditations and prayers relating to the law of God."

Third, the Bible will be a book of success, because it reaches out through so many lines of life. With Joshua, the study of it kept him in fresh remembrance of how Moses was not only the lawgiver, but the intercessor, the brave warrior, the self-sacrificing friend (when he prayed to God after the people had sinned in making the golden calf: "If thou wilt forgive their sin; and, if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book." Ex. 32: 32). Moses was also as a physician to the Hebrews when he fashioned the brazen serpent at the command of God for the healing of those who had been bitten by serpents. (Num. 21: 4-9.) Moses was also a leader in useful arts. (Ex. 35-29.) By meditating daily upon the Word of God, Joshua would be kept in mind of what he might be to the people.

Plainly, if any one should be told that he could be the possessor of only one book, his wisest choice would be the Bible. Let us consider why.

First. Because no other book has for so many centuries and so widely influenced the world. It can be spoken of as a "world book" in a sense that no other book can.

Second. It is a living book; its statements and its teachings are as applicable to present day problems as they were in ancient times.

Third. It is a universal book, because it has been possible to translate it into all languages (now numbering over five hundred).

Fourth. It is the ideal law book, the ten commandments having been taken as the basis for jurisprudence in all ages.

Fifth. It is the only book whose scientific statements have not in fact gone out of date almost as soon as published because of "new discoveries." The Bible taught centuries before science that God stretched the earth over the empty place, and hung the world upon nothing.

Sixth. The Bible is the most complete guide to art, for one may look through the great galleries of the world in Rome, Florence, Dresden, Berlin and Paris and find that many of the most renowned paintings are of Bible scenes.

Seventh. The Bible is the book that has inspired some of the best musical compositions of the world, such as "The Creation" and "The Messiah."

Eighth. The Bible is the book that has produced the best scholarship in the world through the efforts that have been made for its exposition and translation.

Ninth. The Bible is the best family book in the world, because it has sanctified marriage and has given parents and grandparents the means of making their children wise unto salvation, according to the way that the boy Timothy was taught by Lois and Eunice.

Tenth. The Bible is the best trade book in the world, because it has had a more widely extended circulation than any other book, and because it has been published in more and in richer forms than any other book.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

"ADVICE ABOUT teaching children four to six years of age so that they may keep up with the Sunday school lesson."—Miss Belle Thompson, Hamilton, Kan.

There is no part of the Bible better adapted to children than the stories we are now having for our International Uniform Sunday School Lessons. For many generations mothers have read these stories to their children as the surest way of interesting them in the Bible. Not only have they read them, but they have told them over and over again until the children loved them better than any other stories. Little Whitney always asked for "the story of Donah" (Jonah), when his mother was ready to tell a Bible story to him. We think teachers would do well to cultivate the art of story-telling—for it is an art—and they will find no difficulty in keeping the children up with the Sunday school lessons. We would suggest that it might not always be well to confine oneself to just the portion assigned for each Sabbath, but tell a good long story, and tell it over and over again for several Sundays. It will interest the children more every time they hear it. Dear Old Stories Told Once More was the title of a book of Bible stories once written by Faith Latimer. It is quite possible that this book might even now be purchased as a guide in learning how to tell Bible stories. Foster's Story of the Bible would also be helpful, and a series of four small books called The Peep of Day Series, which can be ordered from any religious bookstore. We believe that Bible stories told are more sure of interesting children than the same stories read. Pictures should also be shown, such as the Tissot pictures and the so-called "penny pictures," which are reproductions of the best paintings of Bible stories.

Will Mrs. J. C. Talcott kindly consider the foregoing a reply to her inquiry about simple Bible stories? We will also say to her that little stories from everyday life, such as the desires, are not to be found in any book, but must be gathered from current papers, also by observation of children and by conversations with parents and by association with those who make child-study a specialty.

EW PRESIDENT OF THE GENERAL CHRISTIAN CONVENTION

T THE recent International Missionary Convention of the Disciples of Christ at Toronto, Canada, where a new order inaugurated by the formation of t is to be known in the future as the General ·istian Convention, the Rev. liam H. Sheffer of Memphis, Tenn., was elected president for the ensuing year, and will preside over the deliberations of the next convention, which will meet in Atlanta in October, 1914. The Rev. Sheffer has become prominent in his own denomination in recent years, because of the successful work he has done as pastor of one of the leading churches in Memphis. He is a native of Kentucky and received his education at Pansylvania in his native State. Upon graduation from college in 1891 he took up ministerial work at once in Tennessee, first at Bellbuckle, then at Ellahoma, and next at Lewisburg. For a short time he was pastor at Union City; and from there he went to Woodland Street, Nashville, for a short pastorate. He accepted a call to the Linden Avenue Church in Memphis some thirteen years ago, where he still ministers with signal success.

REV. W H. SHEFFER

His church has about seven hundred members and is recognized as one of the influential organizations in Memphis that are making for the religious and social uplift of the city. Mr. Sheffer is at present the president of the ministerial union known as the Pastor's Association of Memphis and is also president of the Tennessee Christian Missionary Convention of his own church.

One circumstance will serve to illustrate the esteem in which he is held by his own church people in Memphis: Last winter one of the strong churches of Los Angeles extended Mr. Sheffer a call to become their pastor, and after considering all sides of the question he decided to accept the call. So he convened his official board, placed before them his resignation and asked to be released. His board, being made up of tactful business men, and knowing that their pastor had tried for years to induce them to build a much needed new church, requested him to hold the resignation in abeyance for a week, which he did. Then that board got busy, bought a new site for a church and paid $27,000 for it and reported to the church the following Sunday that they would build a new church on it at once if their pastor would consent to remain with them. He waited another week, and then said to his church: "I will stay with you if you will subscribe $45,000 for the new church at once." They took him at his word and at that service subscribed $54,000 for the new building. It goes without saying that his church is very happy over his decision to stay with them. This is the man honored at Toronto with the presidency of the General Christian Church Convention.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—EVANGELIST A. J. FITT, of Denver, Col., d a successful campaign in his own tent dur- g the season just closed. As a result of his ork many have been converted and joined the urches of the various denominations.

—THE HOME AND FOREIGN MISSIONARY lead- s of the United States and Canada have cided to engage this winter in the most tensive and important piece of co-operative ork which they have ever undertaken. The ject is to enlist a large number of church embers as missionary workers, supporters and tercessors. There will be several hundred o-day missionary conferences held through- t the United States and Canada. More than venty teams of experienced speakers are al- ady organized for these conferences. This mpaign is planned to lead up to a simulta- eous personal canvass in March, 1914, for mis- onary purposes, on the part of churches of all enominations. More than two hundred speak- rs will participate, and probably hundreds of housands of men will assist in the simultaneous anvass for missionary subscriptions.

—A UNIQUE SERVICE for which Bible classes ere not supposed to be available, is being per- ormed by the adult women's class of the Cen- ral Presbyterian Sabbath school in Atlanta. he class has become somewhat of an employ- ent bureau—a first-aid to the worthy unem- loyed. It is composed of grown women, in- luding some eighty-five who are rated among he substantial business workers of Atlanta. Combined, they have manifested that they can rovide employment and can go further than hat by performing much associated service in he way of relief among the needy. Mrs. R. D. Crusoe is the leader of this class, which began ts special work four years ago. A young woman fresh from the country was without work and needed it at once. It was found for her so easily that the class realized that it had discovered a field of real usefulness. At first the members restricted their efforts to women. Now they have organized their work among themselves, and have become helpful to men and boys as well as girls. Moreover, they are providing a business college scholarship each term for some young woman, and the money for two others is loaned by them to other deserving women. "The great difficulty is to find women who are equipped properly to fill the places that we have to offer," is the declaration of Mrs. Crusoe. "Equipped women are in constant demand. So many girls come in here from the country with no idea of the dangers and difficulties ahead of them." So in providing the business scholarships the class has attacked this problem, too. "Every Sunday we provide new opportunities for somebody," says Mrs. Crusoe, adding, "Practical Christianity, and not merely the theory of it, is our aim."

—A GOOD REPORT comes from the Gospel Mission in Washington, of which Mr. H. W. Kline is superintendent. The chairman of the mission's executive committee, Mr. George W. Wheeler, writes us as follows: "During the past summer the work of the Gospel Mission has been pressed with great energy and success by our band of consecrated men and women from the various churches of the city. Evangelistic services have been conducted every night in the mission hall, many earnest seekers finding their way to the place of prayer. Street meetings have been frequent and proved very effective. The Gospel car has been in use every Sabbath manned by a splendid force of speakers and singers, the spiritual results being most encouraging. Numerous services in churches, camp-meetings, and institutions have been conducted by our workers. The free dispensary has proven an untold blessing to hundreds of physical sufferers. The penny lunch has been patronized by unusual numbers of poor men and women, whose appetites have been appeased at an average cost per meal of about five cents. The bread line at 6.30 o'clock every morning has prevented hundreds from suffering the pangs of hunger. The dormitories have provided comfortable shelter and rest to many of the destitute at the price of ten cents per night or its equivalent in labor. The removal of a brick wall to enlarge the capacity of the mission hall has furnished labor for a number of idle men. The mission troop of Boy Scouts have taken their 200-mile hike to Gettysburg and return. The blessing of God has attended all the efforts of the management." An effort is now being made to raise a thousand dollars for a balance still due on the cost of enlarging the auditorium and to meet other expenses.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

MISS D. M. S., of Decatur, Texas, writes: "I wish to acknowledge a direct and immediate answer to prayer for financial help when in great distress. The help came from a distance, and the helper had no idea of the need." Mrs. A. C. J. writes from Hackman, Pa.: "I wish to acknowledge God's answer to prayer for my son, who, the doctor said, could not live, and for many other answered prayers and blessings every day."

E. S. F., of Camden, N. Y., writes: "Answers to many prayers have come to me during my life, now far past its meridian. I fully believe the restoration to health of my grandson came through prayer to God for his recovery. For many years he suffered with a heart trouble, but is now seemingly well. During the severe illness of one of the ladies in our community, her mother, a German by birth, who was over eighty years of age, and whose support and care came almost wholly from her daughter, was burdened and anxious, and daily—more often than daily—would go and kneel beside the bed of the patient, praying so earnestly and appealingly that her daughter might recover that those who heard her firmly believed that God would hear and answer her prayers. The daughter recovered."

Sometimes when God refuses to grant a request, we see later that his way was far wiser than ours. A Subscriber from Phoenix, Ariz., writes: "I want to thank God that he did not answer my prayer. Had my prayer been answered as I hoped for, it would have been nothing short of a calamity, as it now turns out."

Mrs. G. W. L. writes from Sterling, N. D.: "I promised that if the way was opened and prepared for a dear young friend to go to a Christian school, I would acknowledge it in this department. The way was gloriously made plain, and possible, in answer to earnest prayer. I want to add my testimony that my prayers have been answered many, many times, in very small as well as larger things, and the peace that is promised God's children is mine besides."

Best of all are the answers to prayers for the conversion of unsaved friends. Mrs. T. W. J., of Chattanooga, Tenn., writes: "I want to acknowledge God's wonderful goodness to me in answering my prayer, especially that my husband might be a useful Christian. He did not attend church oftener than once a year, now he is superintendent of a Sunday school and has his whole heart in the work. By the grace of God was this change wrought."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

LOSE OF EPISCOPAL CONVENTION

THE Forty-third Triennial Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church closed in New York on October 25. The re- ons between the House of Bishops l the House of Deputies were some- at strained as the convention sed. Many members of the House Deputies were displeased at the re- al of the bishops to ratify some of progressive measures which had ginated in the lower house, and at failure of the upper house to nsact its business with sufficient spatch. The deputies had appointed committee on despatch of business, ich greatly accelerated their own rk.

Adjournment took place before the ction of a bishop for the diocese of okane. Dr. W. T. Capers was cted to this bishopric but declined. . Hugh Burleson also declined the hopric of North Dakota, and Dr. lo H. Gates the bishopric of Cuba. . J. P. Tyler was elected bishop of rth Dakota in Dr. Burleson's stead, d Dr. W. C. Brown missionary hop of Cuba.

The House of Bishops refused at st to adopt a resolution passed by e House of Deputies making the of- e of presiding bishop elective rather an, as at present, a matter of sen- ity. The bishops later, however, opted the resolution with the pro- sion that the presiding bishop should se to hold that office when he no ger held jurisdiction, that is, on his tirement from the active superin- ndency of a diocese.

Great disappointment was felt nong the members of the broad urch party at the refusal of the shops to ratify a resolution adopted the House of Deputies, authoriz- g the missionary board to co-operate ith the mission boards of other de- minations in foreign work. The shops also declined to ratify the ap- intment of delegates to the Federal ouncil of Churches of Christ.

Mr. F. C. Morehouse, editor of The iving Church, in presenting the re- rt of the committee to consider the evising of the list of saints, advised e adoption of such names as St. Pat- ck, John Wesley, Bishop Seabury and eorge Washington as saints, omit- ng from the calendar the names of me men, such at St. Swithin, about hom little is known. The resolution as referred to the Joint Commission n the Prayer Book.

Advanced ground was taken on eco- omic questions in a resolution dopted by both houses favoring a ore equitable distribution of wealth. Better provision was made for the upport of retired clergymen. A reso- ution was passed authorizing the ap- ointment of a committee consisting f three bishops, three presbyters, and hree laymen to co-operate with the nternational committee on marriage nd divorce in arranging an interna- ional congress to be held in May, 915, at the Panama Exposition "for he purpose of awakening the con- cience of the American people to the reat evil of divorce and re-marriage."

THY WORD

By John M. Morse

MY PRECIOUS Lord! my Saviour dear!
Although I cannot hear thy voice,
Nor see thy face, still thou art near;
I trust in thee, and will rejoice.
The revelations of thy Word
Are echoes of thy voice unheard.

Though doubts and fears, like mighty waves
And howling winds, my bark assail,
Thy Word reveals the blood that saves,
The blood of Jesus shall prevail!
And so in spite of doubts and fears,
Thy written Word my spirit cheers.

O precious Saviour! speak the word;
Say "Peace be still" to troubled waves:
As thou on Galilee wast heard,
Oh, speak for me the word that saves!
Unseen thy face, unheard thy voice,
Yet in thy Word will I rejoice.

MATTHEW 4.12—4.23
Jesus calls the Four
12 Now when he heard that John was delivered up, he withdrew into Gal'i-lee; 13 and leaving Naz'a-reth, he came and dwelt in Ca-per'na-um, which is by the sea, in the borders of Zob-u-lun and Naph'ta-li: 14 that it might be fulfilled which was spoken through I-sa'iah the prophet, saying,
15 h The land of Zeb'u-lun and the land of Naph'ta-li,
i Toward the sea, beyond the Jordan,
Gal'i-lee of the k Gen'tiles,
16 The people that sat in darkness
Saw a great light,
And to them that sat in the region and shadow of death,
To them did light spring up.
17 From that time began Je'sus to preach, and to say, Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.
18 And walking by the sea of Gal'i-lee, he saw two brethren, Si'mon who is called Peter, and Andrew his brother, casting a net into the sea; for they were fishers. 19 And he saith unto them, Come ye after me, and I will make you fishers of men. 20 And they straightway left the nets, and followed him. 21 And going on from thence he saw two other brethren, l James the son of Zeb'e-dee, and John his brother, in the boat with Zeb'e-dee their father, mending their nets: and he called them. 22 And they straightway left the boat and their father, and followed him.

l Or, Jacob m Some ancient authorities read he.
12. Was delivered up. See ch. 14.3-5. Withdrew into Galilee. Jesus left Judæa most probably on account of the hatred of the Pharisees and began his ministry in Galilee. It is not known how long his Judæan ministry lasted. A few authorities say about a month, but most of them eight months. His way led through Samaria. 'Galilee' means a circle or region, which originally contained the twenty cities given by Solomon to Hiram, King of Tyre. Afterwards the name was applied to larger districts, until it included the country southward to the Esdraelon plain.
13. Capernaum. On the northwest coast of the Sea of Galilee. Some writers think it was at the north end of the Sea and on the same site as the modern Tell Hûm. The remains of a synagogue have been found there.
16. The people that sat in darkness. Those who suffered most from the Assyrian invasions.

Advance Announcement

In this connection it is interesting to know that during 1914 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is going to print no less than 2,562,560 words of reading matter alone—more than fourteen times the number of words in the twenty-seven books of the New Testament. The entire Bible contains 774,692 words.

Mere quantity, however, constitutes the smallest part of the wonderful value THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will render back to its readers during 1914. Its high standard of quality and spirituality throughout—the one particular reason for its phenomenal popularity—will be even higher; and it will strive to merit in all respects the position it has so long maintained as the "World's Greatest Family Religious Journal."

The 52 beautiful art covers to be printed through 1914, most of them done in exquisite coloration with a view of their being framed, would cost alone, in an art store, many times the price of a yearly subscription. Among the leading contributors will be: Professor W. H. T. Dau, Dr. Francis E. Clark, Dr. J. H. Jowett, Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, Irving Bacheller, Kathleen Norris, Florence M. Kingsley, Dr. Anna H. Shaw, Professor Edgar J. Banks, Bishop Frank W. Warne, Dr. Orison Swett Marden, Marietta Holley, Ferdinand C. Iglehart, D.D., Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, Rev. David J. Burrell, Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, Professor R. A. Torrey, Rev. A. C. Dixon, and many others in the field of religion and letters.

The 1914 Christian Herald Almanac and Year Book of Facts and Figures will, of course, be given absolutely FREE with each yearly subscription, new or renewal. It contains entirely fresh, new material from cover to cover, and is well worth in itself the full subscription price.

THE BLUE BOWL

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

WHEN I was a tiny kiddie, with a large love of fairy tales in my heart, I went into a Sunday school library to borrow a book—a book full of dragons, and fair ladies, and brave knights. But when I tiptoed up to the lady in charge and made known my desire, she looked rather surprised until all at once her face brightened and she handed me an old-fashioned, worn little volume.

"This," she informed me with a smile typical of Sunday school librarians, "is a nice story for little girls."

I clasped the story to my heart, and rushed home to a nice tight spot between a short squatty table and a long, thin bookcase, which I called my reading-room. Then I began to explore into the story.

Trustingly I opened the book; happily I began to read. To this day I do not remember many important things about the story, the name of it, or the author, or the illustrations; but I think I shall be able to tell you the plot fairly well. Here it is:

There was once a painfully good little girl named (I think) Rosamund. She always did what her mother asked her to, and never found fault, or asked questions, or disobeyed. But one day a serpent crept into her Eden in the shape of some money—to be used in the purchase of shoes.

Rosamund started on her shopping expedition, prim little skirts unwrinkled, prim little mouth pursed up, prim little eyes straight ahead. Then suddenly she saw a druggist's shop. And in the window of the shop she saw a glass jar, apparently of a wonderful blue color. Perhaps Rosamund said: "Retro me Satanas," and perhaps she forgot it; but to make a long story short, she went into the shop and spent her shoe money for the bowl.

Days went by and the child's slippers grew shabby and full of holes. But she was happy. She still had the beautiful blue thing that continued to dazzle her eyes. Then one day the expected disaster happened: Rosamund tipped over the bowl and the cover came off. Out ran a blue liquid and the bowl became just like an ordinary glass jar.

Whereupon, amid weeping and wailing, Rosamund resolved never to spend her money foolishly again.

At this point I hurled the book across the room and lifted my eyebrows disdainfully. I can remember that I thought deep in my heart, what a silly little girl Rosamund had been. Why, she might have made more color for the bowl by asking cook for some blueing mixed with water. Or she might have filled the jar with the pink liquid made by combining red ink and water. And yet she had cried and written morals at the end of her book.

At times I still think of Rosamund, and I still have a not very exalted opinion of her brain power. Have you ever known any Rosamunds in real life? I have.

There was a girl that went to school with me when I was in the academic department. We were taking up a very stiff course—Latin and French and geometry, and many other things. This girl could have been a good scholar, if she had wanted to. But she never thought of studying until the night before an examination. Then she would come to me and say:

"I know that I won't pass this exam. What shall I do?"

"Cram hard to-night," I generally advised, but she would always shake her head and say:

"I know what I will do. I will pray this evening that I may pass my examinations."

Of course she never passed. She never will if she follows out her rather queer and impractical working plan. Of course her faith in prayer is very wonderful, but prayer alone cannot make a girl understand the geometry that she has never studied.

Another girl that I know had a very pretty new dress. She wore it to several places and then one day she caught it on a sharp nail and tore a long jagged rip in it.

Several of us met at a tea party the next afternoon and she began to tell us about the disaster.

"Such a pretty dress!" she mourned. "And now it is all ruined! I wanted to wear it to-day, but of course now I can never use it again."

It was then that the practical one of our group spoke up:

"Silly!" she exclaimed, "I don't see why you can't use it. Put a new panel down the front—you can easily match the material. Why, it will be as good as new!"

We all turned to look at the owner of the dress. Her face was flushed a little bit and her eyes were downcast.

"Why," she murmured, "I never thought of that."

She was another Rosamund and she lacked the ingenuity to refill her blue bowl.

I saw a funny cartoon in one of the papers a few days ago. In seven successive pictures it showed a man—one of the terrible specimens of humanity that cartoonists delight in—telling a silent but interested family the terrible symptoms of a cold that he was suffering from. In the eighth picture a small woman was shown, speaking to him as he sat disconsolately in an arm chair.

"Why," she asked him, with an awful directness, "why don't you do something to cure it?"

Oh, the number of Rosamunds that I see every day in the city, in my home suburb, in the shops, everywhere! For there are times when the whole world seems thoughtless, and troubled, as if every one had spilled the joy and light and color from the blue bowl of life and forgotten to refill it.

"A LITTLE SANCTUARY"

GOD has said that he will be
As a little sanctuary;
When in distant lands we roam
We may find in him a home.
Saviour, wilt thou be to me
As a little sanctuary?

Shield me from the tempter's power;
Cheer me in the lonely hour;
Be my home and hiding-place;
Be my store of boundless grace.
Blessed Saviour, be to me
As a little sanctuary.

Keep me sprinkled with thy blood.
Wash me in thy cleansing flood;
Feed me with thy hallowed Bread.
Shed thy oil upon my head.
Let me ever dwell with thee
In the little sanctuary.

At thy blessed mercy-seat
Let me hold communion sweet;
Let me wait in ceaseless prayer;
Let me bring thee all my care;
Let me always meet with thee
In the little sanctuary.

When with pain and sickness pressed,
Be my place of strength and rest.
When my heart is lone and sad
Let thy presence make me glad.
It is heaven to dwell with thee
In the little sanctuary.

Here my willing heart would stay.
Till shall end life's little day.
Lonely I no longer roam,
For my heart has found its home.
Evermore to dwell with thee
In the little sanctuary.

POSTAL LIFE BUILDING

The Open Door in Life-Insurance

INSURANCE PROTECTION — POSTAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY — HEALTH CONSERVATION

The Postal Life is the only company that opens its doors to the public so that those desiring sound insurance-protection at low cost can deal directly for it, either personally or by correspondence.

Whether you call or write, you make a guaranteed saving corresponding to the agent's first-year commission, less the moderate advertising charge. This first-year commission ranges up to 40% of the premium on whole-life policies

In subsequent years, you save the Renewal Commission other companies pay their agents, namely, 7½%, and you also receive an Office-Expense Saving of 2%, making up the Annual Dividend of 9½% Guaranteed in the Policy

If you were to call at the office of any other company, or write to it, you might secure insurance, of course, but not direct; the policy would go to you through some agent or agency that would get the commission. You wouldn't get it.

In fact, the other company wouldn't be permitted to give it to you, unless everyone else got it: it would be illegal discrimination.

The Postal Life, however, dispenses entirely with agents. Its policyholders—all of them alike—get the benefit of the saving thus effected by direct insurance.

STRONG POSTAL POINTS

First: Standard policy reserves, now $10,000,000. Insurance in force nearly $50,000,000.

Second: Old-line legal-reserve insurance — not fraternal or assessment.

Third: Standard policy provisions, approved by the State Insurance Department.

Fourth: Operates under strict State requirements and subject to the United States postal authorities.

Fifth: High medical standards in the selection of risks.

Sixth: Policyholders' Health Bureau provides one free medical examination each year, if desired.

Such is the POSTAL way: the door is open to you. Call at the company's offices, if convenient, or write now and find out the exact sum it will pay you at your age—the first year and every other.

See How Easy It Is

In writing simply say: "Mail me insurance particulars for my age as per CHRISTIAN HERALD of Nov. 12th.

In your letter be sure to give
1. Your Full Name.
2. Your Occupation.
3. The Exact Date of your Birth.

No agent will be sent to visit you: the Postal Life employs no agents.

ifteen minutes later Mr. Maxwell in the Gazette editor's office fac- him and wondering what he ited.

uring all the years of Maxwell's torate in Raymond, extending over nty years, Edward Norman, a nber of Maxwell's church, and Jas- Carter, a non-churchman, had n rival newspaper men. The News s a morning paper, independent in itics, ready to give its aid to all d reforms, and a steady, distinc- e force for law and order.

The Gazette was managed by Car- on the principle that seems to ern many large city dailies, where sationalism and exaggeration of me, scandal and sin are the leading tures. Carter had always opposed churches and had boasted more n once that he could drive any man of his pulpit if he got too radical h the preaching of reform. He had ght for the saloon when it was in ger of being voted out, and when it s finally outlawed he still advocated h license and insisted on personal erty. He was for the segregation vice and a police armed with clubs d guns. He was specially bitter d hostile to all preachers and often oke of them in his editorials as on-producers." He gloried in "prog- ss," and defined it in terms of ney-making and success. Withal, had made out of his paper a money- tting investment and was proud of s influence in Raymond.

It is not, therefore, strange that r. Maxwell wondered why Carter uld wish to see him. On his way the office he connected the editor's quest with the coming of Jesus. nd Carter's first words, spoken po- ely enough, showed him that his rmise was correct.

"I wanted to see you, Mr. Maxwell, out this—this person who calls him- lf Jesus. I understand he is stay- g with you. Are you willing to tell e what you think of him?"

It was characteristic of Carter's ef- ontery that he had not the slightest esitation about using any one for his wn advantage if he thought he could et anything out of him for his paper. made no difference to him that he ad sneered at men like Maxwell all is life and cast contempt on the hurch and all it stood for.

Mr. Maxwell understood the char- cter of the man completely.

"Mr. Carter, I may say frankly I on't care to talk about him for any ublication. I have already refused o be interviewed on the subject by the epresentatives of other papers."

"But I notice the News seems to ave inside information. I suppose ou give to your own flock what you do ot give to strangers on the outside."

"I have not talked to any newspa- er men about him. Whatever has ppeared in the News does not con- ain any quotations or opinions of nine."

"I suppose you have noticed the different views expressed by different people in town about this person's outward appearance? Does that strike you as peculiar?"

"Mr. Carter, if you requested me to come here to talk about—this—Person, I wish to say again frankly, I do not care to talk to you about him."

"To me?"

"To you or any other newspaper man."

"Why not?" Carter was beginning to get angry.

"I don't think it necessary to give reasons." Mr. Maxwell rose to go. But Carter smiled blandly and said,

"Don't go, Mr. Maxwell. I have an interesting statement to make that I am sure will deeply concern you. Have you noticed that up to the present time not a single picture of—of—this person calling himself Jesus has appeared in any paper? Do you realize that such a thing is an astonishing fact?"

Mr. Maxwell could not help saying it was.

"I don mind telling you, Mr. Maxwell, that, as no doubt you would expect, the Gazette has tried to get a picture, but so far has failed."

Mr. Maxwell was saying silently, "For which failure I am deeply thankful."

"And I don't mind saying—in fact, that is one reason I wanted to see you—that I myself tried to get a picture of him, but my plates are clear—no negative."

Mr. Maxwell made no comment. Carter looked at him sharply.

"Is not that a curious thing? How do you account for it?"

"I don't account for it."

Carter was silent a moment, as if measuring how far he could go. Then he said with a great show of frankness:

"Mr. Maxwell, could you do me a favor? I understand, of course, we have not always been on your side and all that, but we've always fought in the open, and—well—while I've no use for the preachers generally, I've always had respect for your consistency. Now, you're near to this person; what is the reason you couldn't get the secret of this rather remarkable feat of beating a camera, and let us have it? Or, why shouldn't you find out why his picture can't be taken, or, better yet, get one for us? I promise you, Mr. Maxwell, I will treat the matter sensibly—or my head reporter will, Mr. Barnes. And, by the way, he claims to be a convert, really believes it is Jesus and all that—he will write up a 'story' in your own style, if you will help out, you know. Besides, it's your teaching, you know, to forgive your enemies. What better chance can you have than right now? I don't mind saying very frankly that the reason I want this picture is to beat the other papers. Correspondents are headed this way from all over the country. Why should we let them get ahead of our own local press?"

The first feeling that came over Maxwell while Carter was speaking was one of intense anger. But he controlled himself as Carter paused, enough to say calmly,

"You will have to excuse me, Mr. Carter, for refusing to do what you ask. I may as well say I don't believe in your journalistic methods and I can't be a party to them."

Carter bounded up out of his chair in one of his sudden bursts of rage.

"And you call yourself a Christian? You're one of those whining, sanctimonious preachers, 'holier than thou,' who go around measuring up all other persons with their little standards of conduct, ciphers themselves in the general world of progress and—"

Mr. Maxwell had risen and he simply said, "Good day, Mr. Carter," and walked out of the office. As he opened the door he ran into Barnes, who from the look on his face had evidently caught a part of Carter's remarks, as the editor had raised his voice. Barnes gave Maxwell a glance of respect and then went on into the office.

Carter was standing by his desk, white-lipped and snarling, but he turned about before Barnes could speak and began pawing over things on his desk.

"I have brought up that manuscript you wanted me to read. You told me to bring it back as soon as I was through with it."

"Well?" Carter's "Well?" could mean almost anything according to his mood. Barnes ignored it and went on.

"It's the most remarkable manuscript I ever read, Mr. Carter. What are you going to do with it?"

"I don't know yet. Leave it here."

Barnes put it down on the editor's desk and then, judging from Carter's looks that he did not want to talk, he started to go out. Just as he got to the door Carter called him back.

"Why shouldn't I publish the thing in the Gazette?"

"You could, of course, but—"

"But what?"

"It contradicts everything the paper stands for."

"What of that?"

"I don't believe you would dare print it."

"I dare do anything I like for the paper." Carter spoke irritably. Then, calming down, he said:

"See here, Barnes. This — this — person you believe is Jesus—annoys me. I've got out of sorts over him. I might as well confess to you that this mystery of the cameras haunts me. The correspondents of a dozen big papers are coming in here to-morrow. Some of them will reach here to-night. Now, it's incredible that modern journalism will fall down over this picture business. I want you to go to this meeting Maxwell has arranged for him to-morrow, and by hook or crook secure a picture. I don't care how you get it. But get it. I tried to wheedle Maxwell into helping us out, but he didn't rise to flattery, and—"

"Was that flattery I heard as I came in?"

"Well, no—I lost myself a little. You know my failing. But this little matter of the negatives has got on my nerves and—well—you have got to get busy and secure that picture at any costs. I count on you, Barnes. Find out the trick. For, of course, it's a trick all right."

"I do not believe it is a trick, Mr. Carter." Barnes spoke slowly.

"Not a trick! What—"

"I must say also that I cannot do what you ask. I believe with all my soul that this is Jesus actually come to earth again. I do not believe I have any right to exploit his person in the paper. If, for his own good reasons, he chooses to defend himself from the impertinence of the press, I will not—"

"Impertinence!" Carter's voice cut across Barnes's sentence with rough insistence. "What have you been doing all your life but get the photographs of famous people whether they liked it or not? It is our business. It is all in the day's work."

"It is not in my day's work any more, Mr. Carter."

"What's the matter with you?"

"I told you, Mr. Carter, I have become a Christian. I am his disciple."

Carter suppressed an oath. Then, after a pause,

"Do you mean to say, Barnes, that you actually believe this person is Jesus Christ, the same person who was here nineteen hundred years ago?"

"I believe it with all my soul."

"Your soul?"

"Yes."

"You never mentioned it before. I have never heard of it all these years. Barnes, do you really believe such a stupendous thing could happen?"

YOUR physician knows how necessary it is to keep your mouth and throat clean and reasonably free from germs. It is from germs settling in the linings of the mouth and throat that we catch sore throat, influenza and other serious maladies. Duplex RICHMOND

He Did Not Get the Original Duplex

A Church Treasurer wrote us a few days ago:

"The envelopes I ordered from you through ———— are not glued properly, as you can see by the one enclosed. Our Church Council thinks you ought to refund half the cost. The envelopes are not as heavy, either, as your samples were."

The writer (whose name and address will be given on request) wanted the original Duplex and thought he was getting it. But the dealer substituted without letting him know. If you order through an agent specify DUPLEX-RICHMOND, VA. Note the trade-mark. The original Duplex is absolutely guaranteed. beautiful large new building. The day I visited the hospital the doctor in charge told me many pitiful tales of suffering, due largely to ignorance of the most common rules of health. The out-patients' room shows one enough of this. While the women wait there for their turn they hear the Gospel message from the Bible woman in attendance. I was told that frequently they get so interested that they come back to the room and listen longer, even after their bodily needs have been attended to.

On one side of the hospital is a big compound containing a number of bungalows where live the missionary in charge of the station work, two of the college professors, the lady in charge of the district evangelistic work for women, and the doctor of the Victor Albert. On the other side is the Bible Training School. Here over thirty women are in training for two years to prepare themselves for Bible work. Some of them take a partial Bible course and give the rest of their time to industrial work along the line of sewing, lace-making, drawn-work and embroidery, and so pay for part of their support while they are studying. This is a very efficient institution, and its influence is felt not only in the Madura Mission, but in others round about. The force of twelve Bible women in town comes from those educated for the work in this school.

The educational work of the mission is flourishing and extensive. There are primary schools in town for Hindu girls; there is a big boarding school for Christian girls; and the boys' education is looked after in lower schools, a town high school and the Madura Mission College.

The mission college has a beautiful site in a suburb nearer the center of the city. There is a big central building with an assembly hall and classrooms, laboratories and the like, and a new science hall is a promise of the near future. A good-sized dormitory is about to have its capacity doubled by the addition of a second story. Then there are two bungalows for the principal and another professor. This college has an enrolment of about 150 of all kinds, Christian, Hindu, and Mohammedan, and one who has his work there has vast opportunities for Christian service in addition to the routine of his educational duties.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

"It has happened."

"Barnes, you are a fool!"

Barnes made no reply.

"You're a fool."

"I'm willing to be one."

"But I don't know that I'm willing to have one on the Gazette. One of us will have to go off the pay roll."

"I'm ready to go any time."

"Oh, look here, Barnes. You can't really believe such an absurdity. It would be a miracle."

"It is a miracle."

"Miracle? There isn't any."

"Why not?"

"In this age?"

"Why not? What has the age got to do with it?"

"To do with it!" Carter exploded. "You're a fool."

"You've said it three times, but it doesn't make me one."

Carter struck his desk with his fist.

"This person you believe is Jesus is a fakir. I will make it my business to expose him."

"And yet you cannot with all your boasted progress and science get his picture."

"That is a trick."

"It is a miracle."

Carter got up quickly from his desk.

"Barnes, if he is really Jesus, as you say, why did he not prove it the other day by bringing to life Mrs. Page's little girl? Didn't you hear that they begged him to do that and he refused?"

"I don't know why, but I don't rest my faith in him on any mighty works he may do."

"You don't! What do you rest it on?"

"On himself. I believe in him."

Carter was walking up and down. He stopped, looked at Barnes sharply, then suddenly put his hand on his shoulder, and said frankly:

"Barnes, old man, you've been on the Gazette a long time. How many years is it?"

"Fifteen."

"And you've come to be invaluable to me. You've stayed by the job and you've been faithful to the Gazette and its policy. I hate to see you going off on this tangent. You're deluded."

"I have been all these years, Mr. Carter. But not now. For the first time in my life I see clearly."

Carter moved over to his desk and sat down. Then he said coldly,

"You refuse to do what I ask?"

"Yes. I can't do it."

A pause. Then—

"One of us will have to go, Barnes. We are not running a Sunday school here."

"I expect I had better go, anyway, Mr. Carter. There are too many things in the paper that I can't agree with any more, and they will be making trouble between us right along."

"You can stay through your month," Carter said shortly. "At the end of that time I can prove to you that you are a fool and you will want to stay with the Gazette."

Barnes looked at the editor earnestly. The new Barnes. What a wonder that Carter did not see right there in front of him a miracle greater than a dead person raised to life! But his eyes were holden that he should not see.

Barnes went out gently, and Carter sat moodily staring at the things on his desk.

Suddenly he seized the manuscript Barnes had brought back, opened it, and for the fourth time began to read it.

It was the most astonishing manuscript he had ever read.

The Enduring Gift

Every woman loves a jewel. Every boy, girl, youth and man has at some time admired a fine ring.

Rings have always been more than gifts. They carry with them more than a mere "gift" sentiment. A birthday ring, for example, always delights because of the sweet significance of the birthstone, as well as the regard of the giver and the enduring quality of the gift itself. So, when you give, let your gift fulfil that existing desire for something beautiful. Give a ring—a handsome ring—a ring you can afford—a W-W-W Ring—the gift that will endure.

For whatever gift occasion—birthday, holiday or anniversary—you will find the most appropriate ring, no matter who it is for, in

Mr. Churchill, therefore, cannot shelter his onslaught upon the churches under the words which he has placed at the head of his story, and which seem to express the sentiment of Christ. What Christ attacked and what Mr. Churchill attacks are two utterly different propositions.

2. The conduct of Mr. Churchill's hero in combating the unrighteousness of his parishioners is unbecoming a Christian minister and void of pastoral tact and wisdom. When Hodder discovers the crooked doings of Parr, with whom he has been on rare terms of intimacy for such a man, he stays away from him for a long time. He creates, by his own temper, that sad estrangement which no true pastor will allow to spring up between him and the parishioner whom he knows to be erring. When Hodder finally goes to speak to Parr, he has not only passed judgment in his own mind on the wicked acts of Parr, but on the reclaimableness of Parr. He treats Parr a priori as a reprobate. There is in his dealings with this man nothing of that pastoral love which yearns for the soul of the sinner, which comes to win the brother who has trespassed. There is in them nothing of that smiting of a righteous man which, David says, is a kindness; nothing of that reproof which is an excellent oil, and does not break the head. There is in them nothing of that patient, persistent endeavor which hopes against the most forbidding odds for the ultimate return of the prodigal. But all is settled at one encounter, and that encounter turns out to be a mere brutal measuring of stubbornness against stubbornness.

In the same chapter from which Mr. Churchill took the catchword for his story, our Lord declares that he would often have gathered the children of Jerusalem, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and they would not. How often had Hodder tried to "gather" Parr, and Ferguson, and the rest? Back of the awful rebuke of Christ in Matthew 23 there is the solemn background of a ministry of mercy and compassion. There is no such background to Hodder's sudden assault. Hodder's indignation cannot be placed alongside of that of Christ. It was brutal.

Christ laid down an excellent rule for dealing with a trespassing brother in Matt. 18: 15-17. As a preacher, Hodder, before others, should have acted according to that rule. But he called in no one to aid him in convincing Parr of his trespass and turning him back from his ruinous career. Nor did Hodder "tell it to the church." He practically ruled Parr out of the church upon his own sovereign authority as the pastor of the church, which by all divine and human laws he had ceased to be in truth.

Altogether, in his final dealings with Parr, Hodder acts the rôle of the nemesis in a Greek drama rather than that of an ambassador of Christ, who comes pleading: Be ye reconciled to God! Hodder comes in to Parr as society's avenger of the wrongs it has suffered at the hands of the wealthy financier, not as the rescuer of the lost sheep of the fold. Hodder considers it his duty to assert civil righteousness, and forgets his true mission, viz.: to proclaim that righteousness which is by faith in Christ Jesus, who came to seek that which is lost, and who died to save sinners. Thus his effort proves abortive both by his commissions and omissions.

3. The same recklessness is observable in Hodder when he comes before his congregation with his new belief. It has caused him a fierce internal struggle and weeks of mental distress and agony to pass through his spiritual metamorphosis, though we are not told that he consulted the good Book as the commonest Christian would do in such days of spiritual affliction. His congregation had a right to feel justly and painfully surprised at the change that had come over their pastor. Even assuming that Hodder was right in his new belief, upon what grounds of reason or equity could he expect or demand that his changed views should be acceptable to his congregation, or that he might canvass them among his congregation? Must a congregation revise its creed every time the pastor gets his theological head turned east side west? Does a parishioner go to church on Sundays chiefly for the purpose of being informed what his religious convictions have become since the Sunday before? Then faith has ceased to be an affair of intelligence, based upon sufficient information and sound proof, and is become a blind groping after a blind leader, and its basis is not the objective one of the teaching of Scripture but the subjective one of a man's changing whims.

Hodder, with a stupefying nonchalance, assumes that he has a perfect right to continue as the pastor of a church whose faith he repudiates. He has promised to serve his congregation upon a certain confessional basis. He breaks his promise and tells his congregation that he has done so, but he is utterly oblivious of this most elementary ethical duty, viz., that with his new belief he must not attempt to occupy the pulpit of a congregation which has covenanted to stand upon a certain creed and has called him to teach and uphold that creed against gainsayers. This action of Hodder implied, whether he was conscious of it or not, that his congregation really has never taken its own confessional basis, nor its belief in Scripture, nor, in fact, itself and its religious convictions, seriously, and that it really does not care what becomes of them. Mr. Churchill, who by this latest novel of his shows that he knows unrighteousness when he sees it, has not a word of censure on this plainly unethical conduct of his hero.

Right here is a point where we have always felt liberal theologians, higher critics, reformers of the traditional beliefs and ways of the church, deniers of the faith once delivered unto the saints, to be astonishingly deficient in moral sensitiveness. God-fearing men have, out of their own substance, furnished the means for erecting churches, schools, colleges, seminaries; have endowed these institutions for the purpose that their faith should be propagated through them, and their children are supporting these institutions with the same end in view. Years after, a race of destructive, negative theologians comes into these institutions, appropriates the emoluments and perquisites set aside for the support of those who serve in them, and then proceeds to do the very opposite of what the originators and the owners and supporters intend to have done through them. And when some one reminds these persons that with their belief they are in the wrong place, and when they are asked to step down from and out of positions which were never made for them, and in which they plainly do not belong, up goes the cry of religious intolerance, persecution, bigotry, and what not, and these remarkable gentlemen pose as martyrs.

There are other points in which Mr. Churchill's arraignment deserves just censure: e.g., his picture of the villainy of the leaders of the church is overdrawn, and will only serve to confirm the ungrounded beliefs and increase the unjust charges of people who say that they cannot join a church "because there are so many hypocrites in it."

Meanwhile, the members of the Chrisian churches should be careful not to disregard the real lesson that is contained even in this faulty undertaking of the novelist. The lesson is this: if the practices of Christians glaringly and persistently contradict their teaching, their religion is worthless to themselves and cannot but impress people outside of the church as a ludicrous self-deception.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Discontent or Praise?*

THANKSGIVING DAY! Day of praise!

The contrast made in our title is striking. We do not often think of discontent as being the opposite of praise, but it is so. While we are discontented, that is, fretfully, worrisomely discontented, we cannot be praising God.

We are apt to try to justify ourselves by saying. "No. I am not discontented with God, but with myself. I am displeased that I do not do my work better, that I do not plan out my time and strength to greater advantage, that I do not get ahead faster." This may be all right, but it may be all wrong. If we do not look out we shall find an undercurrent of grumbling in our lives, grumbling first with ourselves, then with others, then with circumstances; then, if we are not careful, with God himself.

Many present-day writers and teachers have strong things to say against the American habit of fretting. Much of this widespread habit comes from two other bad habits—the habit of haste and the habit of trying to do too many things.

We do not mean to get mixed up with so many things, but one thing leads to another, and before we know it we are tangled up in a maze of confusing duties, so that we are almost never at ease or calm. It is all right to be busy, but if we find that we have come into a habit of discontent, we should look over our weekly program and do some cutting down. Leave enough to keep you busy, but take off enough so you can do the rest without fretting.

There are other kinds of fretting, arising from even less worthy causes. Selfishness, impatience, harshness. These things spoil the atmosphere of a life, a home, an office. Greed and pride and envy lead to discontent. We want things that we cannot afford, because our neighbors and companions have them. We are discontented with our lot because others have more. Instead of enjoying what we have, and praising God for it, we fret because we do not have more. Then there is lack of trust. While we are worrying we are not trusting. We slip over worry as one of the little sins, whereas it is one of the worst, for it usually means, in reality, that we are not trusting God.

The more one thinks of it, the more it appears that to get rid of our discontent is a most excellent way to get ready for praise and thanksgiving. The root of discontent is that we are failing to find happiness in the ways we expected. Our efforts may bring us something, but they do not bring us happiness, which is the thing we want. Then we realize that these things can never bring happiness, and we come humbly back to God and ask him what to do.

There is a beautiful verse in the Old Testament, the seventh verse of the fourth Psalm: "Thou hast put gladness in my heart, more than in the time that their corn and their wine increase." That is how real gladness comes—not from success or wealth or pleasure, but straight from God. If we are discontented on this Thanksgiving season, stop and think. Let your disappointments and your anxieties go, and think of God. He will put the gladness in your heart.

Then you will begin to praise him. You will see how rich your life really is, though it may lack much that others have. You will begin to thank him for health, and for youth, and for home and love and friends and work, and for a chance to do something for others to show your love for him.

Then—there will be a miracle. This life of contentment and praise will, very likely, lead you on to the attainment of many of the things you are fretting now because you cannot get. Surely it will lead you to greater opportunity and greater power and greater victories. You will not get them by fretting; you will get them by trusting and praising, and by working in God's strength and in the atmosphere of his gladness.

God's Best Gift to Me*

THIS has been a good year—hasn't it? Full of good and happy things.

The Scripture references contain a singularly beautiful list of God's gifts of the first magnitude. The passage from the Psalms (Ps. 103: 105) calls upon the soul to praise God for pardon, for health, for protection, for a crown of kindness, for satisfaction. In II Cor. 2: 14, Paul thanks God for spiritual triumphs and for the opportunity of spreading the knowledge of God everywhere he goes. In Col. 1: 12-14 he praises him for the hope of heaven, for deliverance from the power of evil and for the forgiveness of sins. In II Cor. 9: 15 he exclaims: "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift"—the gift of Jesus to be his Saviour and his Friend.

Are you enjoying that greatest gift of all on this Thanksgiving Day? The gift of the pardon which Jesus brought, and the priceless gift of his friendship? Think also of the biggest blessing in your home or school or social or business life, and thank God for these, not forgetting, of course, to thank him, too, for the smaller gifts. Particularly if he has helped you bring the gift of his salvation to some other lives will you want to thank him for that. These are the victories for which Paul was grateful. Then plan that by the time the next Thanksgiving Day has come you will have led still more people to him and helped them in their souls and minds and bodies to be glad.

* "WHAT IS MY GREATEST CAUSE FOR GRATITUDE?" Epworth League Topic for Sunday, November 23, 1913. Ps. 103: 1-5; II Cor. 2: 14; Col. 1: 12-14; II Cor. 9: 15.

WORKS ALL DAY

And Studies at Night on Grape-Nuts Food

Some of the world's great men have worked during the day and studied evenings to fit themselves for greater things. But it requires a good constitution generally to do this.

A Ga. man was able to keep it up with ease after he had learned the sustaining power of Grape-Nuts, although he had failed in health before he changed his food supply. He says:

"Three years ago I had a severe attack of stomach trouble which left me unable to eat anything but bread and water.

"The nervous strain at my office from 6 A.M. to 6 P.M. and improper foods caused my health to fail rapidly. Cereal and so-called 'Foods' were tried without benefit until I saw Grape-Nuts mentioned in the paper.

"In hopeless desperation I tried this food and at once gained strength, flesh and appetite. I am now able to work all day at the office and study at night, without the nervous exhaustion that was usual before I tried Grape-Nuts.

"It leaves me strengthened, refreshed, satisfied; nerves quieted and toned up, body and brain waste restored. I would have been a living skeleton, or more likely a dead one, by this time, if it had not been for Grape-Nuts."

Care of the teeth is now recognized as necessary to good health—and care means a well-chosen dentifrice, as well as a twice-a-year visit to the dentist.

TEETH AND PSYCHOLOGY.

Education is by the mouth. At any rate, this has been found measurably true of the backward school children of Cleveland, Ohio. Dentists put their teeth in order, physiologists showed them how to breathe and to chew their food, and after six months, experimental psychologists were called in.

A girl of 13, with sixteen decayed teeth, requiring twenty-five fillings, has improved 10 per cent. in memory 159 per cent. in spontaneous association, 57 per cent. in addition, and 600 per cent. in association by opposites. Her quickness of perception has not changed, although her total gain during the treatment was 168 per cent.

A boy whose teeth are bad, whose mouth and throat are swollen and germ-laden, whose nasal, oral and ocular passages are stopped up, blinks when he looks at the blackboard, fails to hear his name when called upon, is bowed by defective breathing, and is pained in digestion. He becomes a truant, rebellious and a liar. Give him an oral cleansing and complete masticatory repairs, and you begin to make of him a gentleman and a scholar.

ARION SCHOOL'S DENTAL SQUAD.

The dentists of this country are conducting intelligent campaigns for oral hygiene in its schools. Their National committee has gathered into records the fruits of the work accomplished in the Cleveland schools, so that they may be available for workers everywhere in this field. The Dental Digest has presented, in successive issues, an account of the improvement, mental, moral, and physical, resulting from the experiment of the care of the teeth and mouths of a squad of foreign-born children selected from the 1,000 pupils in the Marion School of Cleveland. Parallel with their bad oral conditions were bad conditions of physique, mentality, and a sulky, resentful, and insubordinate moral state.

Mayor Asks Dr. Wile to Enter Upon Systematic Work.

Mayor Gaynor to-day appointed Ira S. Wile, of 230 West Ninety-seventh street a member of the Board of Education to succeed Jeremiah T. Mahoney, who resigned recently to accept promotion to the position of Commissioner of Accounts. In his letter appointing Dr. Wile the Mayor outlined his ideas for child hygiene in the schools which he hopes to see forwarded by the new member. The letter reads as follows:

"I am appointing you a member of the Board of Education. My object in doing so is to have you enter systematically into the work of examining into the health of the children in the public schools and taking scientific means of prevention and cure. Among other things the eyes, ears and teeth of the children should be carefully looked into.

"It is almost impossible to have a healthy body without good teeth. But I shall not go into particulars. Your past experience in dealing with the defects and diseases of children will enable you to think of everything that should be done. I should think it would be well if there were a standing committee for this purpose in the Board of Education, but I submit that to better judgments."

Questions and Answers

Several readers have written us inquiring whether Pastor Sheldon's new story, now running in this journal, is to be accepted as a story of facts or imagination. This is very clearly answered in the pastor's own language, which we printed in our issue of October 1 (page 882). He wrote that for a number of years he had been "brooding over a continuation of the story [In His Steps], which would include the person of Jesus living in actual daily contact with the men and women of to-day. It has seemed to me, as I dwelt upon it, that without irreverence, and as a natural result, Jesus could be imagined as being here to-day, facing our problems and sharing our troubles and entering into our earthly life." It is therefore purely a work of the imagination, the result of a deeply spiritual mind seeking to impress upon men the fact of the presence of Him who said: "Lo, I am with you alway."

Mrs. M. A. D., Hammondsport, N. Y. In your issue of June 25 is an article by William Elliot Griffis on "American and Japanese friendship," in which he mentions the "first four" great American missionaries—Verbeck, Hepburn, Brown and Williams. He does not state the dates of their beginning missionary work in Japan. From this vicinity a missionary, Jonathan Goble, went to Japan in 1859. It is a tradition with us that he was the first American missionary to Japan. For the benefit of his wife, who was sick, he invented the jinrikisha, as she was unable to bear the jolting of the palanquin. On the fly-leaf of a book given to a Mr. Pollay by Jonathan Goble was this inscription, which I have copied: "J Goble, Hamilton College, N. Y., 1855. Carried to Japan, 1859."

In the Encyclopedia of Missions, four missionaries, Williams, Verbeck, Hepburn and Brown are mentioned as having reached Japan in 1859, and Goble in 1860. The inscription quoted by our correspondent, however, would seem to establish the claim that Goble arrived there the same year, though not in the same party and perhaps in an earlier month.

A. E. W., Kansas City, Mo. The parable of the barren fig-tree (Mark 11) was intended to convey a special lesson of warning. Allegorically, the fig-tree served in the Old Testament as an emblem of the Jewish nation. Edersheim says: "The vineyard was symbolic of the kingdom of God as distinct from the nation of Israel. God called Israel as a nation, and planted it in the most favorable spot, as a fig-tree in his vineyard. He came seeking fruit as he had a right to expect, but found none." Then the Messiah, to whom the vineyard was committed, uttered his condemnation, and ordered the fruitless tree to be cut down as a cumberer of the soil. Another and more obvious lesson to be drawn from the incident is indicated in Matt. 21: 21, dealing with the power of faith to accomplish things seemingly impossible.

Reader, Dubuque, Ia. Can there be such a thing as unconscious conversion?

There are doubtless many excellent Christian people who, having been brought up in Christian homes, were so thoroughly surrounded by religious influences in their childhood that they might be said to have been believers all their lives. This is the result of ideal Christian training. Such persons might have no remembrance of any time when they were not believers, and they might have no impression of any special change, although conscious of steady growth and progress in the spiritual life. Even in such cases, however, there must come a time when fuller realization begins through regeneration by the power of the Holy Spirit, who preaches true repentance and by faith works conversion. Then the desire for more thorough consecration and larger or more definite service makes itself felt, and such a period marks the true spiritual awakening and new birth.

N. H., Chambersburg, Pa. 1. See Matt. 28: 2-4 and parallel passages in the other Gospels for the description of the women's visit to the tomb of Christ. 2. Mary, when she recognized the Saviour, in the first rush of emotion would have touched him or clasped him in homage or worship, but he forbade her approach. His work was not yet completed and she, too, had a mission to perform, of which he reminded her—to go and tell his brethren that they might be assured of his resurrection and might know of his coming ascension. 3. The Ark of the Covenant, in its exterior appearance, is believed to have been designed after the pattern of that which is supposed to have been used in the earlier worship, outside of Eden, although no detailed description of the cherubim is found among the sacred historians. Josephus in his Antiquities, book 8: 3, 3, says: "No one can say but conjecture what the cherubim actually were." Ezek. 1 speaks of them as living creatures under animal forms. Jewish tradition implies that they had the faces of human beings. All that we learn about these figures is that they had each a body and "stood on their feet." II Chron. 3: 13. That they had wings can also be inferred from various passages. They possessed a purely symbolic significance. Much has been written concerning them by Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine, Philo, Irenæus, Justin Martyr and many others, and a wide range of speculation has developed. The whole literature would fill many shelves of a library.

T. T. R., Athens, Tenn. An institution of learning supported by the state is a desirable thing, but not an institution for the teaching of a state religion. One of the bulwarks of our American constitution is the complete freedom of religion which it grants to all. Further, institutions that teach religion should not be under state control, but absolutely free from it, whether supported by a denomination or from any other legitimnte source. We know what a state religion has done in other lands, and we know how our own forefathers came to this hemisphere to enjoy freedom of worship uncontrolled by state religious domination. Religious education is the sphere of the church, and not of the state. Moreover, history shows that the people who enjoy freedom of religion are the happiest and most progressive. Russia has a state religion and there the church joins hands with the state in persecuting all who differ from it in belief. The same was formerly true in Italy, Spain and Portugal. Lecky's History of European Morals, which you will find in almost any public library, will give you abundant material.

Reader, Coopersburg, Pa. The power to announce the forgiveness of sins, which Jesus conferred on the apostles (see Matt. 18: 18 and John 20: 23) was declarative and not personal. They were authorized to declare the divine purpose to those who were truly repentant and who accepted Christ as the Son of God through the preaching of the Gospel. This is the interpretation by commentators generally. Jamieson, Fausset and Brown say on this passage: "In any literal and authoritative sense, this power was never exercised by one of the apostles, and plainly was never understood by themselves as possessed by them personally, or conveyed to them. The power to intrude upon the relation between God and man cannot have been given by Christ to his ministers in any but a ministerial or declarative sense—as the authorized interpreters of his Word. There are, however, other commentators and large church bodies who hold differently (see Augsburg Confession and Lutheran Catechism). These latter believe that there exists in the church of God "a peculiar church power which Christ has given to his church on earth to forgive the sins of penitent sinners unto them, but to retain the sins of the unpenitent, as long as they do not repent"; that the called ministers forgive sins and absolve those who repent and in so doing act as the instruments of God or in virtue of the external office of the ministry and that "this is as valid and certain in heaven as if Christ dealt with us himself."

Miscellaneous

T. T. C., Stanley, N. Y. We agree with your interpretation on the subject, as it is in accordance with Scripture.

M. B. W., Pittsfield, Me. The poem you mention: "Bread upon the waters cast shall be gathered at the last," is founded upon the Scripture passage in Eccles. 11: 1.

The poem entitled "Mother-Hunger," which appeared in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we are now informed by a reader of this journal was written by Mrs. Grace Duffield Goodwin, and appeared originally in the Chicago Advance.

Mrs. E. T. W., Altmond, Mo. The postmaster doubtless has the right to forbid the putting up of posters in the postoffice, which is supposed to be devoted to official business exclusively, although we have seen country postoffices with signs and posters in abundance. In places where the postmaster has a store or other business combined with the postoffice, we presume he would have power to grant such a privilege, were he so disposed.

M. B., New Zion, S. C. 1. There is no such passage in the Bible. The restoration of the Jews is foreshadowed, however, in Rom. 11: 11-25, but this may be in a spiritual sense only, and commentators are not agreed that the final ingathering of the scattered race is to be interpreted physically. On the other hand, there are many who hold that they are yet to be restored to their original home. 2. Lightning rods were unknown in Bible times. 3. The marriage of those related by ties of blood was forbidden up to certain degrees, but second cousins were not specially referred to.

THAT the resources of diplomacy have not yet been exhausted in dealing with the Mexican situation has again become evident. Months have passed and, with the exception of a few interchanges, mainly verbal, between the two governments, the progress made toward a solution of the trouble has been almost imperceptible. Each government has been "marking time" in its turn and preparing for eventualities.

During the last days of October, however, there was a somewhat unexpected change, and the situation suddenly acquired new interest from rumors in Washington, which were apparently confirmed by despatches from Mexico City, that an official note had been conveyed by this government to Huerta, which was calculated to bring the whole controversy to a focus. Published accounts stated circumstantially that President Wilson's "note," which had been handed by our chargé d'affaires, Mr. Shaughnessy, to Huerta's secretary, and by him conveyed to the dictator personally, was in general terms substantially as follows:

"The memorandum from the administration at Washington stated that unless General Huerta retires immediately, and thereafter has nothing to do with the conduct of affairs or the formation of a new government, the President of the United States will issue an ultimatum, which, if rejected, will cause him to call upon Congress to authorize him to use sterner methods."

It was added in the Mexican telegrams that this interpretation of the "note" had caused Huerta's friends "to regard the American communication as in itself conclusive, since General Huerta was given no choice regarding further participation in Mexico's affairs." It was held to mean that this government will be satisfied with nothing less than the dictator's absolute retirement from the office he is regarded as having usurped, and that he must not attempt to leave in the presidency any of his own appointees as his successor. Of course, the transmission of such a message (which, it was further averred, had been counseled by Mr. Lind, President Wilson's personal envoy, now at Vera Cruz), was in itself an event which, if it really took place, might very naturally be regarded in the light of an ultimatum. Our government has never conceded Huerta's official status, for the reason that it has strongly disapproved of the manner in which he assumed the presidency. Nor could it be expected to approve of his reported plan to place General Blanquet in that office, while he himself took command of the army—a scheme which would simply leave the situation more complicated and objectionable than before. Besides, there is no concealment of the fact that our government disapproves wholly of the manner in which the late elections in Mexico were conducted, since no free expression of the popular will was permitted at the polls, and the whole machinery of Huerta's administration, including the army, was employed to produce the result he himself desired in order to perpetuate his dictatorship.

For a time the Washington authorities had nothing to say regarding the "note" to Huerta, but when, at last, Secretary of State Bryan did speak on the subject, it was to puncture the whole fabric of conjecture and to show that the newspapers had been misled by trouble-makers into giving currency to the "note" story. There had been no such note, Mr. Bryan quietly declared, and certainly no communication, verbal or written, of the character indicated in the despatches. The rumors were the coinage of certain persons who were engaged in aggravating the complications in Mexico, and were to be condemned. Such reports he considered essentially harmful. He did not, however, explicitly deny that there had been a communication sent to Huerta, and left the impression that while the government had taken such a step, it had preferred to keep the matter private at the present stage of the controversy.

The Secretary's denial, however, seemed to simply stir up new interest in the incident. On November 5 it was reported in Washington that a reply had been received from Huerta, but whether verbal or written could not be ascertained. While the dictator made no definite announcement of his intentions, the report went on to state, he took occasion to characterize the American attitude as unfair and dictatorial, and intimated that in his future course he would be guided rather by considerations affecting other Powers than the United States. It was further related that Huerta, before making this reply, had given the American message full consideration. He had summoned the diplomatic corps to the palace, but what took place at that meeting was not

THE ISLAND OF PHILAE, WHICH IS ALWAYS FLOODED BY A HIGH NILE

THE WATER CARRIERS

THERE is fear of famine in the land of Egypt. When the writer arrived in Cairo on September 8, 1913, Moslem sheiks and Coptic priests alike were calling on their people to pray that Allah would cause the Nile to rise to its usual height, for never before in history, so far as the government records show, was the river so low as in 1913. September is the month of flood inundation, and only a single stretch or two of ten miles are covered with water; whereas, usually, the Nile overflows the whole valley.

The Nile is the only river in Egypt. It is one of the longest rivers in the world. Its main waters come through the channel of the White Nile from the very center of the great continent of Africa. The waters of the inundation period, however, come down by the Blue Nile from the highlands of Abyssinia. The latter bring with them great quantities of sediment and fertility, so that truly, as Herodotus has said, "Egypt is the gift of the Nile." There is very little rain in Egypt. Yet, by means of the river, three, and sometimes four, harvests are gathered in a single year.

About June 15 occurs what is known as the Lailet el-Nuktah, or "the night of the first drop." The ancients believed that the tears of Isis, weeping over Osiris' death, caused the Nile to rise. This marks the very beginning of the flood. From this date the river continues to rise until about the middle of August, when a ceremony takes place called Wefa en-Nil, or "the cutting of the dam." In ancient times this act was accompanied by great ceremony. Seneca relates that offerings of gold and other gifts were thrown into the Nile by the priests to propitiate the deity of the river. An Arab historian, El-Makrizi, tells how they used to sacrifice a beautiful maiden annually to obtain a plentiful flood. To-day, still, the Nile is revered, and by most Egyptians its rising is little understood. The flood is caused, of course, by the rains in Central Africa, especially by those in Abyssinia. The Coptic Christians almost worship the Nile.

Famine, or great scarcity, always follows a low Nile. This year thousands of acres of fertile, alluvial soil have been sown, which are sure to remain dry and barren because there is no water. A well-known editor and landowner in Cairo has sown one thousand dollars' worth of rice as seed without the slightest prospect of any return for his trouble. The nilometer on the island of Roda, just opposite Old Cairo, the records of which have been preserved for nearly a thousand years, knows no measurement as low as the present. It records the high floods of 1874 and 1878 (the highest of the nineteenth century), of 1887 and 1892, also, which were particularly good; and also the low floods of 1868, 1873, 1877, 1888 and 1899, all of which were very low, as likewise those of 1902 and 1907; and among its records, also, there is mention of certain early floods such as that of 1880, which was forty-nine days earlier than usual, and of late floods, as that of 1894, which was twenty-four days late. Famine may result from either too high or too low a Nile, from a deficiency or from excess. The narrow margin of two meters, or about six and one-half feet, is enough to make the difference between a good and a bad Nile. At the First Cataract the difference between low and high Nile is a matter of fifty feet: at Cairo, of about twenty-five.

THE PYRAMIDS OF GIZEH WITH THE NILE AT FLOOD

Two ancient artificial devices are still used to raise the water from the river to the level of the fields: One is the sakiyeh, or wheel, to which are fastened jars for catching the water as the wheel is turned by cattle or buffaloes, camels or asses; the other is the shaduf, also a very ancient device for raising the water. It resembles the sweep of an old-style well in our own country. A leathern bucket is suspended from one end of the sweep, while at the other end a huge lump of dried mud serves as a balance.

During the time of inundation, September and October, the river is usually considerably higher than the level of the country; in Upper Egypt about three feet higher, in the Delta along the Rosetta and Damietta branches of the river as much as twelve feet. As the river overflows the fields, the villages become islands in shallow lakes, on which sailboats are often used. The lower houses are sometimes swamped, and the inhabitants imprisoned. In Lower Egypt the land is so much below the level of the river that it has to be protected by longitudinal embankments. In Upper Egypt, on the other hand, the flood is welcomed, as the alluvial deposit left behind by the water is needed to enrich the soil. The level of the valley is said to increase at the rate of six inches in every one hundred years. Since the coming of the British to Egypt there has been a great increase of the perennial irrigation that depends upon great dams. This is vastly more expensive, but also vastly more profitable, and in a year like the present is the only hope of the land. Not infrequently, as a matter of record, has a low Nile caused dearth in Egypt, and in some cases the famine has lasted for several years, as, for example, that of 1064-71 A.D. Ancient inscriptions also confirm this view. One found at El-Kab in Upper Egypt, the sepulchral inscription of Baba, who actually lived during the period of the later Hyksos kings at the end of the seventeenth dynasty, and, therefore, very close to the time of Joseph, relates how he, the deceased, "collected corn, as a friend of the harvest god, and was watchful at the time of sowing; and when a famine arose, lasting many years, distributed corn to the city each year of famine." Besides this, there are other illustrations of the Genesis account: e. g., the inscription of Ameni, a governor under Usertesen II, of the twelfth dynasty, and the so-called "Seven Years' Famine Inscription" of the Ptolemaic period, which records how in the reign of King Zoser of the third dynasty, the Nile failed to rise during a period of seven years, and that a famine arose in the land in consequence. To-day, however, famine is averted through English foresight. The five great dams which have been thrown across the river at Cairo, Assiut, Zifta, Esna and Aswan, coupled with the other constructions, canals, embankments, etc., which have been introduced, make it possible to supply enough water to avert real want.

NEARING A CRISIS IN MEXICO

revealed. Thus, on the whole, while there was nothing absolutely authentic or official regarding the "note" and its answer, the rumors that obtained currency were generally believed to have some basis of fact, and to indicate the approach of a crisis.

It is a matter of talk in official circles in Washington that a satisfactory understanding has been reached between our own and other governments under which the latter agree to take no initiative in the Mexican situation and to maintain a neutral attitude. Evidence confirmatory of this attitude is found in a Paris cablegram dated November 5, which stated that the French foreign office had been requested by Mexico to mediate between that country and the United States, but had refused.

"The French Government," the despatch added, "has taken the attitude that it will do nothing until further advised as to the policy of the United States toward Mexico, and will then do nothing which might be unwelcome to the Washington Government." There has even been talk of our recognition of the Carranza Constitutionalists as the de facto government, but the administration is discreetly silent on such matters. There are no indications that intervention is in view, as some have asserted, and in any event it would only be regarded as a last resort. Still, with nine United States warships and a number of European cruisers in Gulf waters, the dictator is now facing conditions which cannot be misinterpreted. He is now in a position by any rash step to precipitate an event which would inevitably result in the blockading of the Mexican ports, the capture of the coast cities, and possibly the investment of his capital itself. These are remote possibilities, of course, and it is still hoped that intervention may be averted.

Meanwhile, Americans and other foreigners in the disturbed republic are having a disagreeable time of it. For weeks past they have been leaving the country as rapidly as possible, but there are many foreigners at interior points who have been unable to get away, and their lot has been an unenviable one lately.

AN EVENT of national interest in the November elections was the complete overthrow of the Tammany organization in New York. Citizens of all classes and political affiliations united for the purpose of ridding the city of the corruptionists who had ruled it for many years, and who, if they had remained in power during the next four years, would have controlled expenditures aggregating many millions of the taxpayers' money. But Tuesday, November 4, witnessed the most complete rout Tammany has suffered since the days of Tweed. John Purroy Mitchel, the Fusion candidate, was elected mayor by the phenomenal plurality of 121,000 votes over ex-Judge Edward E. McCall, the Tammany candidate. The Fusionists made practically a clean sweep all along the line, electing William A. Prendergast, controller; George McAneny, borough president of Manhattan; fourteen out of sixteen members of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, and a good working majority of the Board of Aldermen. Tammany also lost control of the Lower House of the State legislature. All the Fusion majorities were large, showing that the public conscience had been tremendously active in the fight against Tammany and corruption.

This was the climax of a whirlwind campaign, which has seldom been equaled for vituperation and excitement. During October, revelations of graft and official corruption were made which startled the entire State, showing how public offices had been bought and sold and public moneys absorbed as political graft. It is generally conceded that the turning point of the situation which has resulted in Tammany's overthrow was the war made by Boss Murphy and his organization on Governor Sulzer, whose impeachment was followed by a series of startling disclosures, in which the names of Tammany officials were connected with charges of graft. These disclosures were kept up to the very day of the election. It was somewhat in the nature of a public vindication when ex-Governor Sulzer, who after his impeachment was nominated in the Sixth Assembly District, was elected to the legislature, running far ahead of his Democratic opponent. One significant result was the defeat of 29 out of 46 Assemblymen who voted for the impeachment of Governor Sulzer, all of whom were renominated, but were snowed under in the general landslide.

In pulling down Sulzer, it proved that the Tammany leader pulled down the pillars of the Tammany temple about his own ears and those of his associates. But the political earthquake was not confined to New York City. Throughout the State it assumed the form of a revolt against boss domination, and in many cities the Democratic candidates were defeated. One of the results of the situation is that the Republicans will have a majority in the next Assembly, the figures standing: Republicans 68, Democrats 40, Fusion-Democrats 10, and Progressives 26. Bartlett (Dem.) was elected chief judge of the Court of Appeals, and Hiscock (Rep.) associate justice.

John Purroy Mitchel, the newly elected mayor of New York, is in his thirty-fourth year. He is of Scotch-Irish descent, is a university graduate, and has been for years the uncompromising foe of Tammany. He was assistant corporation counsel in 1906-7, and afterwards served successively as commissioner of accounts, president of the Board of Aldermen, acting mayor (1910) and collector of the port. He has fought strenuously to protect the city's interests in connection with the award of the subway franchises. While collector, he organized a system to increase the efficiency of the customs service at the port of New York. Mr. Mitchel, on learning of his triumphant election, said that he regarded the success of the Fusion ticket as a triumph for good government. "I shall be mayor for all the people of New York," he said, "and not for any faction, division or party."

District Attorney Charles S. Whitman, who has already done excellent public service in that office, was re-elected, his name appearing on all the tickets except the Socialist.

Tammany Hall in Fourteenth Street was a scene of unrelieved gloom on election day. During the greater part of the day the outside doors were closed, and in the evening, in an inner room, Leader Murphy and a group of intimates received the returns. It did not take long to convince them of the reality of the landslide. When it was apparent that the whole county ticket had gone and that the disaster had extended throughout all the boroughs, the Tammany leader admitted defeat, and refusing all interviewers, went home.

Elections in Other States

IN THE Massachusetts election, David I. Walsh of Fitchburg, Democrat, now lieutenant governor, was elected governor by about 60,000 plurality. He carried Boston by over 28,000. Both branches of the legislature will be under Republican control. In New Jersey James F. Fielder, Democrat, was elected governor by a plurality of 15,000 to 25,000 over E. C. Stokes, Republican. The Democrats retain control of the Assembly and possibly, also, the Senate. President Wilson went home to cast his vote with his New Jersey neighbors, returning the same day. In Philadelphia Mayor Blankenburg's administration was defeated in its effort to gain control of the councils; Samuel P. Rotan was re-elected district attorney; James B. Sheehan, register of wills; William McCoach, city treasurer; and W. F. Kendrick, receiver of taxes. Pennsylvania Republicans claim that the results of the election assure the choice of a Republican United States Senator and governor next year. In Virginia the entire State Democratic ticket, headed by Henry C. Stuart, was elected, and the legislature is overwhelmingly Democratic. In Maryland Blair Lee, Democrat-Progressive, was elected United States Senator to succeed William Jackson by 30,000 majority. The Democrats in Baltimore elected their candidates for comptroller and Court of Appeals clerk. In Indianapolis Joseph E. Bell, Democrat, was elected mayor by 8,500 majority.

General Notes

—EACH OF OUR lives is a campaign. And in the end, when the returns are all in, it will be found that the true heart which sought not its own advancement but labored for the good of humanity, is victor in the battle, while the self-seeker and the mercenary will be cast aside.

—A RECENT DESPATCH from Munich, Bavaria, states that the senate of that kingdom has voted to support a measure for the dethronement of her "mad king Otto." The ministerial council decided to present such a measure to the diet, and by a majority of both legislative chambers Prince Regent Ludwig, who has ruled for forty years, has been declared king to succeed his deposed cousin, by the title of Ludwig III.

—MEAGER REPORTS of serious fighting came from the Philippine Islands during the later part of October. A battle began at Talipao, Mindanao, on the 21st between Moro tribesmen and the Thirtieth, Sixteenth, Twenty-first, Twenty-fourth and Thirty-first Companies of Philippine Scouts. Five scouts were reported killed and eight wounded, among the latter being Captain Harry McEldery of the Thirteenth Company.

—FIFTY-FOUR DEATHS from drowning were reported on October 29 by despatches from San Salvador. Large districts had been inundated by a rainfall of unprecedented severity, which lasted two days and nights. Communication with parts of the flooded territory has been cut off, and it is feared that many more have been lost. The village of Vera Paz, near San Vicente, was almost entirely destroyed. Over ten inches of rain fell during the downpour, and the property loss in the lowlands is consequently very heavy.

—THE ANNUAL REPORT just issued by the commissioner of pensions shows that while heavy inroads have been made by death, more than one-fifth of the men who served in the army and navy of the United States during the Civil War were still on the pension rolls on July 1 last, the beginning of the new fiscal year. There were 462,379 pensioners on the roll. The estimated number of individuals in the United States army during the war was 2,213,365. During the past year there was a decrease of 34,884 Civil War pensioners, while the net loss in the entire pension roll was 40,094, leaving 820,200 pensioners of all classes. There remain 1,142 Mexican War pensioners and 1,066 from Indian wars. The last surviving pensioner of the war of 1812 died eight years ago, although 199 widows of that war's fights still receive pensions, a decrease of 39 since last year. Ohio leads the States with the largest number of pensioners, 77,599, followed by Pennsylvania, with 75,618; New York, 68,270; Illinois, 56,482; Indiana, 49,987; Missouri, 39,490; Michigan, 34,298, and Massachusetts, 34,124.

THE ESSENTIAL

TEXT: "I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock." Matt. 7: 24

A SERMON

By

Rev. Charles Lewis Slattery, D.D.*

IT IS the highest characteristic of a genius that he reaches out for the essential. We are sure that he is a poet who by a few common words can thrill us with the conviction of a fundamental truth. We are sure that he is an artist who, with a few strokes of his brush, can put on his canvas the very soul of the man he is beginning to paint. We are sure that he is a friend who by an instinctive glance can give us sympathy and understanding. We name him a wise man who builds his house upon a rock. The house may be anything you please—a poem, a picture, a friendship, or one of ten thousand other things; if it is always planted firmly on a rock, we know that he who put it there has some of the genius of greatness.

But one need not be a genius to take immediate advantage of the essential. True, some people could not see the essential quality in a task if it flaunted its colors in their very eyes. Possibly it is destined that some people must twitter and dabble as they approach any undertaking, and so invariably miss the one true point of it all. But most people, I am convinced, can cultivate the habit of grasping the essential in whatever confronts them. The ordinary work of each day comes to each one of us: for one it is studying a book; for another, teaching a lesson; for one it is deciding upon buying; for another, deciding upon selling. The work may be trivial or momentous. In any case it is our work; and the doing it well or badly marks us wise or foolish. It is the house in our Saviour's parable. If we build it on the rock, we dig the sand away, find the essential and stable foundation, and there build what will last. Rain and wind cannot affect it.

This will seem to you still figurative, so let us try to apply the parable to two or three vital and ordinary aspects of our everyday experience. Think of speech, of manners, and of faith.

The Spoken Word

First, then, think of speech. By speech I mean the ordinary conversation of our daily life. I mean the words you say to your families at home, to your associates in business, to your friends on the street. You might think this something that would take care of itself. But we know that it does not take care of itself. We know that a word, said without any intent to injure, can bring discord to a family, riot to the business world, enmity between friends. I am not thinking of slander, of malicious lying, of self-conceit, of venomous envy, of profane babbling, or any other form of positive wickedness which may inspire hurtful words. I am thinking only of words uttered carelessly, or as we say naturally—words said inadvertently in the course of a busy day with no intention of either pleasing or displeasing. These words have often power to mar the happiness of a man, a family, or a whole community.

When the culprit discovers what he has done, what does he say? I am assuming that he is an upright man; he does not intend to injure any one. Does he not invariably say, "I did not mean what you thought I meant; you misunderstood me"? It is a lamentable confession for any mature person to make. It does very well for children, who must learn sometimes, by long and bitter experience, the use of words; but grown men and women ought long ago to have come to a decision how they shall use the words of daily life. Friends intervene with their kind excuses. "Oh," they say, "he is a good man, but he has no tact." Or, "She is a good woman, but she talks so fluently that she does not always think what she says." Or, "He uses words in such a strange, exaggerated sense that you never can be sure what he means. When you have known him as long as I have known him, you will be able to translate his words." Meanwhile, some one crosses the street rather than meet the offender; another is shamed before the whole town because a shocking rumor is going from mouth to mouth on the offender's authority; still another plots all sorts of vengeance upon the head of one who he thinks has maligned him, and already is putting forth bitter stories which may embroil half the town before they have reached their end.

Is not the rock clearly revealed on which all speech should be built? The first essential for all conversation, for all public utterance, is plainness, clearness, straightforward truth. I am not forgetting that there are times when silence is golden, but if one feels that to speak is necessary, then the simplest, clearest words are always best.

It is easy to be indirect. One sometimes becomes indirect to save a friend's feelings; or to shield oneself; or to let people suppose that one has done more than a strict veracity would account for; or to give opportunity for flowing sentences and quaint words; or to mystify and astonish the simple people; or to seem profound when one has nothing whatever to say. To the cheap and vulgar mind, coming immediately to the point seems abrupt or inelegant. Therefore we talk with people who hide their meaning in tortuous introductions, and we listen to public speakers who send us home with no thoughts at all, and with the vague consciousness only that we have heard several thousand rather ingenious syllables. All such build their houses on the shifting sands. The lightest summer zephyr blows their castles to the sea like so many cards. Nothing survives except the ruin.

It is a commonplace that speaking the truth is the bond of society. It is because we trust our neighbors to tell us the truth that there can be any such thing as business, or government, or friendship. But something more is necessary: we must speak the truth simply, plainly, directly. From youth to old age, one of the most important lessons a man or woman can learn is straightforward clearness at each moment when words are called for. Who does not know the torture which invariably comes when one attempts to conceal truth or to maintain deception? There are mazes ahead which become more and more perplexing till one must choose definitely between humiliating confession and destruction.

I am no pessimist, yet I am inclined to think that the transparent soul, able and willing to say the clear, simple truth each moment when speech is necessary, is a very rare soul. The people who are either dense or warped are in an alarming majority. It was a keen poet who looked forward to rare moments when

> The eye sinks inward, and the heart lies plain,
> And what we mean, we say.

It is one of the marks of our sinless Master that each time he spoke he cut straight through all the traditional sophistry of his time and came directly to the simple words of clear and convincing truth. People said, "Never man spake like this man." They did not mean that he used fine language or many words. They meant that no one before ever had said in so few words, so simply, so clearly, the whole white truth. He spoke of himself as a "man who told the truth."

When we talk, whether in private or in public, let us pray for God's help to say clearly what we mean, in simplicity and in truth. Then we shall, in so far, have built our house upon the rock.

The Good Manners of Kindness

The thought of the use of words leads us to think of manners. The superficial observer is apt to say that manners are merely the conventionalities of society, that a certain class of people having certain tasks to perform have one sort of manners, and a certain other class have another sort of manners. And, say these easy critics, we call one set of manners polished, and another set crude. A man who feels that this is true will maintain that if he would have good manners all he need do is to wear such and such clothes, to live in a designated kind of house, to have certain ways of greeting people, and to live in general as he sees that one whom he admires is living. But the uncomfortable truth will at last thrust itself upon this attentive person that, though he scrupulously keep every maxim of cultivated society, he is being called a cad or some other equally unsavory name. He will learn that he has built his house upon the sand. Manners, like everything else, have an essential foundation, on which alone they can survive.

What now is that foundation? What is it that can make good manners in the king's palace and in the frontiersman's cabin? What is it for lack of which people of so-called refinement, as well as the awkward boor, are the dread of all discriminating spirits? What is the essential quality which alone lays the solid foundation of good manners? It is obvious: it is kindness.

For think what kindness will do. Kindness, of course, will do the unselfish act which helps in conspicuous disaster. Kindness will be ready with words of gratitude and appreciation. Kindness will always do the greater deeds promptly. But kindness descends to minute details. Kindness recognizes the nicer ways of doing little things, not because a certain way of doing them is better in itself, but simply because doing them so puts all who are about one at their ease. If one did not do them so, one's presence would grate on one's companions—not because they are prigs, but simply because they are accustomed to such usage. Therefore it is that the truly kind man, upon going to a new environment, whether that environment be another man's house or another man's country, tries to accommodate himself to the trifling ways which he finds there in vogue. He is unkempt who parades his own etiquette, however good in itself, in a place or a country where the kindest people have other ways. In all this, you notice, I speak only of the small courtesies and refinements of life. For, of course, in the great principles of life, all civilized lands have the same inevitable standards. If a man is invariably kind in all things, so kind that he can always forget his own preferences, even himself, his manners will, as the flowers in the field, convert the commonplace into the beautiful. If he is not kind, let him be as cultivated as you please, his manners must reveal from time to time great rifts of clumsiness and selfish absurdity.

As we pray God for clearness and simple plainness in our speech, let us also beseech him to give us kindness in our manners. So only shall we build our house upon the rock.

The Foundation of Faith

One more instance I give of the grave need of grasping the essential; and that is in the region of what we call faith. Faith is one of the words that defies definition: it is sufficient to say that it stands in general for all that we hold sacred. It is connected with the church, with the Bible, with our individual relationship to God. We get our faith in a singularly irregular way. The child has an instinctive acknowledgment of a higher life surrounding and sustaining him. His parents may tell him somewhat, as he asks his perplexing questions. Schools may add a little. He may gather a little more from religious instruction. His own inquisitive reading may lead him still farther. In any case, faith is apt to be developed in a very irregular fashion. So when a man is out in the life of the world, there is found to be a group of certain loosely associated beliefs and confidences which make up whatever faith he has. And then, some day, the person with such a loosely acquired faith encounters a learned man or a learned book which overturns one of his cherished beliefs, and because he finds this belief in a detail going, he throws up his hands, surrendering all his faith in the divine. It would be ridiculous if it were not tragic.

Before I point out the remedy, notice a few of the details to which I refer. The child learns, for instance, that the Bible is inspired. This may come to mean to him that each word in it is infallible, that it not only tells us religious truth, but also accurate truth about geology and astronomy. Years later, when perhaps he has long ceased to read the Bible at all, he is convinced that the science—if we can call it such—as recorded in the early chapters of Genesis cannot be literally true. The spiritual and religious truth is exactly as clear as ever. But he passes that by and fixes his attention upon one thing: a theory which he once had about the Bible has been disproved to his sincere conviction. He speaks up quickly. "Well," he says, "if it is wrong there, it is wrong everywhere. And if the Bible is not what I thought, over goes my whole faith." He is not weighing what the church has taught about the Bible, or what Christian men to-day teach about it. He weighs simply his own childish notion. Finding that inadequate, he flings the whole Book aside. Similar instances could be given of one's idea of Old Testament prophecy, or of one's idea of

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, November 23. Isaiah 41: 8-16. "Abraham, my friend." I think that is the noblest title ever given to mortal man. It is the speech of the Lord God concerning one of his children. It is something to be coveted even to enjoy the friendship of a noble man; but to have the friendship of God, and to have the holy God name us as his friends, is surely the brightest jewel that can ever shine in a mortal's crown. And such recognition and such glory may be the wonderful lot of thee and me!

"Abraham, my friend!" The Lord of Hosts found delight in human friendships. He comes in to sup with us. He drinks of the cup of our delights. For, surely, it is one of the supreme characteristics of true friendship that it rejoices at the other's joy. And my heavenly Friend is glad in my gladness as well as sympathetic in the day of sadness and tears. Yes, he comes in to sup with me, and I may sup with him.

"Abraham, my friend." And he shares his sweets with his friend, in inward counsels, and in tender revelations of his purposes, and in the gifts of joy and peace. There is perfect openness between these friends; nothing is hid. They have the run of each other's hearts.

I tell him all my joys and fears.
And he reveals his love to me.

MONDAY, November 24. Joshua 3: 1-6. "Sanctify yourselves; for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you." But what relationship is there between the one and the other? Even this: it is only the sanctified who can appreciate the wonders of the Lord. To the unsanctified a divine wonder is an indifferent commonplace. "They have eyes, but they see not;" they have sight but no insight; they have a shallow perception but no mystic vision. They walk down lanes of marvels, but no wayside bush is aflame with mysterious fire. They never take the shoes from off their feet, because they are never conscious of standing upon holy ground. The unsanctified cannot have communion with God, and they never see wonders!

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." They shall behold the marvelous in the commonplace, the fire in the bush, the providence of the ordinary meal. God gives his visions to the holy. "In thy light shall we see light." Our purity is the lens through which we may see the unfolding wonders of grace. And God is waiting to give us the lens; it is given to the lowly and penitent soul that bows at his feet with the prayer, "Lord, that I may receive my sight!"

TUESDAY, November 25. Joshua 3: 7-17. "This day will I begin to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel." Joshua was to receive his true greatness as the gift of God. It was not something he could acquire by culture or assume by sheer aggression. It was the gift of grace. "Thy gentleness hath made me great." It was the divine within him that gave him authority and power. "Thy God thy glory!"

And still must our greatness be sought in the Lord; not in human applause, and not in the dignity of office, but in the grace of God. The real authority of every teacher and preacher must be found in the magnifying presence of God. God in our minds fills the thoughts with vision. God in our hearts fills the emotions with sympathy. God in our wills fills our actions with strength. God in our speech fills the words with unction and grace. It is the indwelling God who makes everything great.

And so does God use the weak to subdue the mighty. He uses the foolish to confound the wise. He converts a reed into an iron pillar, and with the seemingly infirm he builds the new Jerusalem.

WEDNESDAY, November 26. Joshua 4: 1-9. The children of Israel made a memorial of their providences. Each tribe took a stone from the dry bed of the Jordan, and together they built a cairn of remembrance. They made provision against oblivion. They would carry the miracle of grace forward into the morrows, and in after days the wonderful story should be told and told again to their children.

It is good to build memorials to the marvelous deliverances of God. Frances Ridley Havergal kept a "Journal of Mercies." She built her own cairns along the road, and she often went over the old track and recalled the goodness of the Lord. In her latter years she could visit the shrines of earlier years, and all the days were joined together in the shining memories of grace.

Why cannot we keep anniversaries of providence, building memorials all through the year, and making the recurring dates richer and richer with reminders of the goodness of God! The road of our life would be alive with holy suggestiveness, and we should always go into God's house "in the multitude of his mercies."

THURSDAY, November 27. Psalm 44: 1-8. "Our fathers have told us what work Thou didst in their days." And that is one of the most precious bequests which a father can make to his child. We tell them of our early difficulties in business, of our straitened circumstances, and of the gradual enlargement of our way. But to tell them about God, of the wonder of his dealings with us—how he helped us to conquer the beast of passion, how he cheered us in our depression, how he dried our tears and carried us in our weakness, how he enhanced our joys and added sunshine to our day—with what treasures would this testimony enrich our children in their journeyings along an unknown road!

The best thing we can give anybody is the Gospel. We have never given our best gift until we have given the spiritual. "That I may impart unto you some spiritual gift"—this was the great ambition of the apostle Paul, and he was always giving his best away. Let us take heed and give it to our children. Let us tell them about the Lord, and of what the Lord has done for us. Let us open the books and show them the pages that have been illumined by his love and grace.

FRIDAY, November 28. Psalm 114. The Lord turned "the flint into a fountain of waters." What a violent conjunction, the flint becoming the birthplace of a spring! And yet this is happening every day. Men who are as "hard as flint," whose hearts are "like the nether millstone," become springs of gentleness and fountains of exquisite compassion. Beautiful graces, like lovely ferns, grow in the home of severities, and transform the grim, stern soul into a garden of fragrant friendships. This is what Zaccheus was like when his flint became a fountain. It is what Matthew the publican was like when the Lord changed his hard heart into a land of springs.

No one is "too far gone." No hardness is beyond the love and pity of God. The well of eternal life can gush forth even in a desert waste, and "where sin abounds grace doth much more abound." Let us bring our hardness to the Lord. Let us see what he can make of our flint. When we are dry and "feelingless," and desire is dead, let us bring this Sahara to the great Restorer, and "the desert shall rejoice and blossom like the rose."

SATURDAY, November 29. II Kings 2: 4-14. "Ask what I shall do for thee." What will Elisha ask for? If we could only know the measure of a man's desires we should have the measure of the man. There is no place where we more clearly reveal our size than in our requests before God. What is the biggest thing we ask for? What is our conception of a big thing? If I were in the studio of a great artist, and he asked me to make my choice, suppose I were to choose a picture-frame without the picture? Then I should reveal myself and at the same time dishonor him. But we are often no better than this in the presence of our Lord. He offers us the gifts of his grace, and we ask for trifles.

Elisha asked Elijah for a double portion of his spirit. It was a great request, but in asking for it he proved his fitness to receive it. And so it is in our relationship to God. We honor the Lord when we desire the biggest things in his storehouse of grace. When a sinner asks for holiness, when the careworn asks for peace, when the worldling seeks a home, they all give delight to their Lord, for he is glorified in their request. "Ask great things of God; expect great things of God."

THE ESSENTIAL

church government, or of church worship, or of Christian doctrine. It is not uncommon for a person to cease to go to church because he cannot find in his new home just the religious service to which he has grown accustomed; and so, giving up his worship, he gives up other things too, till people count him a sort of pagan.

There is an essential, and but one essential, in the faith of every Christian man. And that is faith in the Personal Father revealed in the character of Jesus Christ—faith in his relationship to you directly—just as directly as you know your best friend. That is the rock, and the only rock, on which faith can be securely built. Then everything else will come to its due and proper place. Theories about the Bible may rise and fall, but the Bible will always be to you the stirring record of God's guidance of the race. It will confirm and strengthen you in your intimations about his loving care over you and over those you love. Changes of administration and of worship may overtake the church, but you will be sure that the same heavenly Father guides it by his Spirit into all truth. From time to time you may wonder if you quite give your assent to this or that doctrine, but if you dwell on the great central truth lying deep within, you wake on a joyful morning to find that the most daring faith of the Christian past is yours by reason as well as by affection. You have won it by receiving the great things first. Your faith will be a personal, living, present faith in a Father who loves men now as Jesus loved people in Palestine nineteen centuries ago. The love revealed there and then in its fulness is revealed to you in countless ways every day. You have built the house of your faith on the Rock. No storm of doubt or controversy can shake that faith. It is immovable.

This is an age of growing faith. More people believe in the love of God to-day than ever before. And the main reason for this outcome is that more people are reaching out primarily for the essential in faith, and are leaving scholarship and time to disclose the details. He who relies on the personal, sustaining trust in a God of Infinite Love, finds that many questions, dark to others, are clear to him. In any case he keeps them in the subordinate place where they belong. His faith is on the Rock.

Words, manners, faith—these are profound elements in any robust life, elements which every wise man seeks early and late to cultivate. Let us pray God to-day for grace to know the essential: in our words, to have plainness and clearness of simple truth; in our manners, invariable kindness; and in our faith, invincible trust in the living God.

A CHURCH EFFICIENCY CONGRESS

THE three thousand delegates to the National Convention of Methodist Men at Indianapolis in the last days of October subscribed unanimously to a world-wide crusade to put the church to work on a basis of sound efficiency; to check the economic waste in present-day religious machinery; to make the support and the spread of the Gospel a definite business proposition. On the records of the convention this crusade was entered under the ambitious title of "A New Policy of Advancement for the Methodist Episcopal Church." To its formation the most far-seeing and progressive intellects of the church had given a labor of months.

From more than one viewpoint the convention was a unique gathering. It was by all odds the largest official assemblage in the history of American Methodism. In its delegates, embracing every State of the Union, were men from all walks of life. It was a meeting of the pulpit and the people to labor with that old and yet ever-new question, What is the matter with the church? The production of the proper return is the problem which the Convention of Methodist Men sought to answer, and to help in answering, brought men from the four corners of the earth. Bishop Homer C. Stuntz of South America, Bishop John L. Nelson of Switzerland, Bishops Cranston of Washington, McDowell of Chicago, McIntyre of Oklahoma City, Hamilton of Boston, Anderson of Cincinnati, Hughes of San Francisco were only a few of the dignitaries who contributed to the shaping of the program. Nor were denominational bounds maintained in the search for speakers. Practically all Protestant creeds were represented in the program.

As officially outlined, the program of the convention divided itself under three definite heads: The task of the Christian Church; the agencies through which this task is to be accomplished; the opportunity and the power of its accomplishment.

The convention sounded an "All to Advance" note in the seven officially determined departments of denominational work: Sunday schools; the circulation of the Scriptures; education, including the uplift of the freedmen of the South; temperance; home missions; church extensions; and foreign missions.

In none of these directions was an effort made to disguise or palliate the fact that, measured by the same standards which would apply to a business enterprise, the Gospel is failing to measure up to its opportunities. "No business in America is in so great danger of being closed by the sheriff as the church for lack of efficient management," declared H. Clay Babel of Buffalo in a symposium of the closing session. The significant fact, however, was that this confession of weakness, of failure, was not one of depression or discouragement. It was as though it were a great galvanizing stimulus, a call to battle.

And what was the final analysis? Admitting the failure of the modern church, not from the standpoint of theology but from the standpoint of business, what are the reasons for that failure as discovered by the Methodist probe? Broadly speaking, the committees of investigation divided their examination under two heads, internal and external. The results of that investigation will be of direct, concrete interest to every church and every church-member, regardless of denomination, for it is the first time that the acid test of a national business efficiency has been applied to the machinery of religion.

Helpful criticism is criticism which not only points an evil but points a cure for that evil. The policy of the Convention of Methodist Men was never destructive but always constructive. In this connection let us cite a concrete example of business efficiency at work in the remaking and regalvanizing of a church organization—that of the City Methodist Church of Crawfordsville, Indiana, as given by J. B. Trimble, one of the two administrative officers of the new national commission on finance.

The first result of the new idea at Crawfordsville was the installation of a duplex or bi-pocket envelope, with one compartment for the current expenses of the church and a second compartment for benevolences, each plainly labeled. The second result was a personal canvass of the congregation, through the medium of four "teams" of solicitors of fifteen men each, for the purpose of obtaining a definite yearly pledge from each parishioner. While the promised contributions in some cases were as low as only five cents a week for each of the central funds, within three months the gross income of the church was increased 50 per cent. But the curious part of it all was that the financial result proved of only secondary importance. The most significant feature of the campaign was the revitalizing of men and women who had been dormant in the church for years.

Let us veer now to the second fundamental feature of the investigation, the external feature, the field outside. "The progress of the church," declared Bishop Anderson of Cincinnati, one of the leaders in the discussion of "The World, the Nation, and the City," "has not kept pace with the development in public affairs. The American church has not been grappling with the broad social questions of the day as it should be doing. It has, moreover, no definite policy of approaching that problem. The city represents the intensity of life. The problem of the church is to make its moral life stronger than its intellectual, or its business, or its social life. The church must do that or it must confess failure and go out of business."

Bishop McDowell in the final message declared: "This is not a convention for the passing of the tariff or revising currency, but for stimulating interest in the kingdom of God and extending the possibilities of that kingdom." It was the launching of a crusade to carry the need of the church to men and the need of men to the church—for the social, civic, industrial and moral evangelization of the world.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

The Author of "In His Steps," Etc., Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

A group of friends are gathered in the library of Rev. Henry Maxwell, pastor of First Church, Raymond, on the anniversary of the day when they had taken the pledge to make "What Would Jesus Do?" the test of their daily lives. In the group are Virginia Page and Richard Stanton, Mr. Maxwell's new assistant. They are all commenting upon a marvelous light which has been appearing in the sky, when Martha, Mrs. Maxwell's maid, enters the room with the exclamation: "Jesus is here!" She declares that he came to the service of the Rectangle Church, a mission founded by First Church, and had gone home with Mr. Grey, the pastor. Mr. Maxwell calls up Mr. Grey by telephone and is informed that the strange Guest is now asleep in his home. Mr. Grey himself comes to the Maxwell home, and relates the details of Jesus' visit to his church. Jasper Carter, editor and proprietor of the Evening Gazette, is intent upon a sensational story, and sends his best reporter, Barnes, and a "cub," Logan, to get the facts and photographs. Both men expose plates, but can get no results. That night Virginia Page and Rachel Page, her sister-in-law, are in Virginia's home. The conversation turns upon Mr. Stanton and it becomes evident that Virginia is unusually interested. Mr. Stanton comes in a few moments later and secures Mrs. Page's consent to sing at the remarkable service which takes place in Mr. Maxwell's church the following morning and at which Jesus addresses the people. Jesus calls upon Jasper Carter, talks with him for an hour, and leaves him a manuscript to read. A conference between Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Grey is interrupted by a telephone message from Rachel Page, announcing that her daughter is very ill. Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Grey reach the Page home just in time to learn that the little girl has died. Jesus is sent for and is present at the burial service, but does not bring the child back to life. Rachel Page finds her faith strengthened rather than weakened and insists that Jesus has comforted her and made her sure that her child is living in a better land. Carter asks Mr. Maxwell to his office and requests him either to secure a photograph of Jesus or find an explanation of the fact that it is impossible to take his picture. Carter is greatly angered by Mr. Maxwell's refusal. Carter summons Barnes, who refuses to make another attempt to get the photograph. He expresses faith in Jesus and criticizes the policy of the Gazette. They agree to separate, but Carter gives Barnes a month to reconsider.

CHAPTER V—Continued

IN THE first place the beauty of the manuscript was beyond anything Jasper Carter had ever known. In all his experience as an editor, as a writer of brilliant editorials and pungent paragraphs, he had never read anything equal to it. Neither could he recall any standard author of any race who had ever written anything to equal it.

Added to beauty of expression was also an astounding knowledge of history and mankind. It was so marked, it was overwhelming. Nothing like it in all ancient or modern literature had ever come under his observation.

At the close of the manuscript were some verses so exquisite, so marvelously constructed that he held his breath as he read them over. Something in them stirred even his dull imagination as if into that prosaic newspaper office had come the fragrant beat of an angel's wing. The indescribable harmony and pathos and charm of the lines defied analysis and criticism. Something in them gripped his heart. He had always denied the supernatural and spiritual. But what was this within him that in spite of himself acknowledged a subtle something different from mere human intellect and knowledge?

He rose greatly excited, and seizing the paper, lifted it up with his powerful hands as if to tear it in pieces. He knew he dared not, yes, dared not print this marvelous manuscript in his paper. The entire thing was a direct and overwhelming blow at his entire newspaper and editorial policy. It was so perfect and clear a scathing rebuke of all the methods he had pursued all his life that every reader of the Gazette would see in every line the selfish, hypocritical, self-centered, unscrupulous editor of the paper. It would make him the butt and scoff of every newspaper in the country, even of those journals that were like his own. And he knew it. For the manuscript before him held him up to himself as he was. With all its unrivaled beauty of style and marvelous splendor of expression he knew as he read that he dared not for his own peace of mind in the future publish the manuscript in his own paper. Yet there it lay, containing words that would make any paper that could print it famous over the world.

He walked up and down restlessly. This—this—person had not asked him to publish the manuscript in the Gazette. He had simply asked him to read it, if he had time. That was all. Why? Why? To reveal him to himself? To picture to his own narrow self-centered person his own little soul bound in the fetters of custom and gross money-grabbing and pitiful ambition?

He snarled as he walked, like some wild animal that is caged and starved.

"I will expose this fakir! No man who lives shall get the better of me with tricks like these. If Barnes is willing to be a fool, I'm not. I'll go to this meeting to-morrow and—"

He turned, went back to his desk, took up the manuscript, looked at it as if fascinated, then suddenly picked it up, thrust it into a pigeonhole of his desk, and with a grim smile resumed his regular work.

Meanwhile Mr. Maxwell on leaving the Gazette office had gone directly to the hotel, where Stanton was stopping until arrangements could be made by Dr. West to give him rooms in his home.

Maxwell found Stanton just opening his mail.

"I have, as you have, a great many letters making inquiry about—Him. I hardly know how to answer all the questions. And yet—"

"And yet?" asked Maxwell.

"I have no doubt. Have not had at any time. I was out on the street a little while ago. What do you think I saw as I went by the municipal playgrounds?"

Maxwell was silent.

"He was out there playing with the children."

"Why not?" Maxwell murmured after a silence.

"Why not? Just what I said." Stanton went on opening letters after asking Maxwell to excuse him.

He read a letter, glanced at Maxwell with a deep look of interest and handed the letter over.

"Chancellor Clark wants you to invite Jesus to speak at the university regular assembly to-morrow morning! Will He go?"

"I have no doubt of it," Stanton replied. "You see the chancellor asks me to come with him and be on the platform. I have not been to the university since I was graduated. I have never met Clark."

"You know him, though?"

"Only what I have heard."

Maxwell was silent.

"I am surprised he has asked Jesus to speak to the students."

"Why?"

"They have no regular chapel service at the university any longer, and Clark is not a religious man. What does he expect Jesus will talk about to the students?"

"I don't know." Stanton sat there very thoughtful. "Of course he must know he has only one theme."

"I see by the letter," Maxwell spoke with quickening interest, "that the chancellor asks you both to take luncheon with him just before chapel service."

"Yes."

"The last time I had luncheon with the chancellor he had three kinds of liquor on the table, and—"

Stanton looked thoughtfully at Maxwell.

"The atmosphere at the university does not seem the same as when I was there."

"No. Since the State put the Bible out of the schools many things are different. Many of the professors at the university are non-Christian men. I think in my time, forty years ago, every teacher was at least a professed Christian."

There was another thoughtful silence as Stanton and Maxwell looked at each other.

"You remember you are due at the afternoon conference at the church at 3.30?"

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

China Looking for Enlightenment

THOUGH Yuan Shi Kai, the new president of China, may pursue rather antiquated methods in his dealings with the rebellious element in his country, every move which brings him and his government in contact with foreign affairs shows that he is seeking the most modern advice and example for China. Acting in the capacity to which that very party had elevated him, Yuan a few weeks ago issued a proclamation by which he abolished from the house of parliament the radical revolutionary party known as the Kuo Ming Tang. The members of this faction have accepted his pronouncement as the inevitable result of their rebellious attempt to force modernization upon their country over the head of their president. At almost the same time that these striking events were transpiring in Peking the Chinese Presidential Commission, headed by the minister of education, was paying a visit in England to the newly inaugurated president's three sons, who are now students of the Cheltenham College. Another commission, composed largely of Chinese who have been educated in this country, is now in America to make a study of American mints and minting. After a visit to Washington these Chinese gentlemen will visit the government mints in Philadelphia, New Orleans and San Francisco.

South American Amenities

THE Argentine gunboat Uruguay, conveying Colonel Roosevelt from Montevideo to Buenos Ayres, fired a salute of twenty-one guns as she entered the harbor November 5. Great crowds and many important official delegates greeted the colonel, who was later escorted by 500 boy scouts about the city. All newspapers welcomed the distinguished American, and "vivas" for the United States were general. Colonel Roosevelt addressed the people from the balcony of the legation advocating reciprocal respect for the spirit of equality by American nations.

A Proposed Peace Land Trade

REPRESENTATIVE FRANK O. SMITH of Maryland has introduced a resolution in Congress, proposing and advocating the sale or exchange of the coast strip of Alaska, known as the Panhandle, to Great Britain, as a fitting mark of the close of a century of peace. The proposal is that in exchange for this territory Great Britain should cede to the United States the little State of British Honduras. That, in turn, would be traded by our government with Mexico for Lower California and a sufficient strip of the Mexican State of Sonora to provide the State of Arizona with a seaport on the Gulf of California and give the United States possession of the coveted naval base, Magdalena Bay. The Panhandle of Alaska is 526 miles long and from eight to thirty-five miles wide, and shuts off Yukon Territory, the northern part of British Columbia, and all of the Mackenzie Basin of Canada from access to the Pacific Coast. Mr. Smith regards this as an unnatural boundary and holds that its rentention by the United States hampers the development of 600,000 miles of the Canada hinterland. He thinks such a trade as he proposes would be a fitting way to celebrate the century of peace between the United States and Great Britain.

Aigrettes Barred at Piers

THE anti-aigrette ruling of the Treasury Department and the widespread anti-aigrette campaign is having at least the effect of rousing the ire of many women who attempt to enter the United States wearing the wondrous feathers that cost the lives of many mother birds and their chicks. The customs inspectors have been instructed to remove all prohibited feathers, and are provided with scissors for that purpose. The steamship Kronprinzessin Cecilie arrived from Bremen a few days ago, and it was estimated that at least fifteen thousand dollars' worth of aigrettes were seized by the customs officers from the women passengers. The events on the pier were none too pleasant for the inspectors, as many of the singers are foreigners who do not sympathize with the United States Government's views on the subject of aigrettes, and many more are Europeanized Americans. On the way over the women in the first cabin of the liner were divided into "Featherists" and "Anti-Featherists." The leader of the antis was Mme. Frieda Hempel, the Metropolitan Opera House prima donna, who made several addresses against the feathers that necessitated the killing of birds.

The customs collectors are badly worried over the question, "What is 'plumage'? The Treasury Department has issued instructions to allow entry of grouse, unplucked, under bond for the return of the feathers, and later, orders that after December 1 the government will refuse entry of unplucked game birds. The latter decision was based on the ruling that the prohibition against importation of heads, wings, and tails of wild birds covered this plumage, whether imported separately or as part of, and on, a dead bird.

California's Permanent Exposition Park

THE city of Los Angeles and all that section of the Pacific slope made holiday on November 5 and 6, the two days set apart for the ceremonial inauguration of the Los Angeles aqueduct and the State's Permanent Exposition Park. The new aqueduct is a splendid engineering achievement, representing eight years of work and an expenditure of $24,500,000. It brings to the city pure mountain water from the snowcapped Sierras, 260 miles away, and traverses both mountains and deserts in its course. It is calculated that there will thus be secured to the city and deposited in its reservoirs, nearly a thousand feet above the street level, 258,000,000 gallons of water every twenty-four hours, or enough to supply a city of 2,000,000 inhabitants. The aqueduct ceremonies were held in the San Fernando Valley, while the ceremonies attending the opening of the State Park took place in Los Angeles itself. This new park has been designed and completed as a permanent exposition park. It contains military, educational, athletic and amusement institutions. It is valued as a $3,000,000 asset to the State.

Patronage Club in Cuban Fight

A DESPATCH from Havana, Cuba, states that President Menocal proposes to begin immediately cutting down government expenses wherever it is possible, and to drop Liberal officials from the pay rolls as a punishment for their party's refusal to allow a quorum in Congress for the purpose of voting a $15,000,000 loan. The government takes the view that, if the loan is not voted, rigid economy will be necessary in order gradually to pay off the country's indebtedness. Of course, only such Liberals as are unprotected by the civil service regulations will be affected by the new policy. The president's attitude was foreshadowed when he announced that constitutional government was blocked by those who refused to perform their duty by attending the sessions of Congress. Whether or not in direct response to this threat, the Cuban Congress convened on November 3, showing a full quorum in both houses. The business of the session was confined to the reading of the presidential message.

1,500 Girls in Y. W. C. A. Pageant

ON NOVEMBER 7 1,500 young women presented a pageant entitled "The Ministering of the Gift" in the great armory of the Seventy-first Regiment in New York City. The presentation was divided into nine scenes or episodes, each depicting a phase of the work of the Young Women's Christian Association. The whole performance was calculated to give a well-rounded impression of the organization's various activities and was not presented as a money-making project. To arouse public interest and give to the people of the city a clearer idea of the aims and methods of the Young Women's Christian Association were the objects, and they were well achieved.

Nearly Hit by a Meteorite

A METEORITE of considerable size dropped into Craddock Park in Malden, Mass., on the evening of November 1, nearly striking two young men, who say that the visitor from space passed within less than a yard of them. So close were they to the flaming mass that the impact of its fall threw them to the ground and they were overcome by the fumes. Both felt the effects of their queer experience for several hours and complained of violent headaches and attacks of nausea. The meteorite buried itself ten feet in the earth, and when the news of its fall was noised abroad, the jagged hole it had made became the center of a curious throng. Scientists from Tufts and Harvard Universities have been called upon to exhume the starry visitor and tell the world of what it is composed. McDonald and Butler, the young men who so miraculously escaped death, declare that they saw the meteorite for several seconds before it reached the earth, but thought it was an ordinary falling star, and never imagined or suspected that it would come anywhere near them.

The Last of the Volturno

MR. E. O. THOMAS, the general agent of the Uranium Line in New York, recently gave out for publication a list of 102 passengers who were lost on the Volturno when she burned at sea on October 9. The list is composed entirely of Russian, Polish and Slavic names. Mr. Thomas believes that there may still be corrections made when the last of the scattered survivors have been checked up. Thirty members of the steamer's crew were lost, but the list has not been made public. This brings the total for the disaster to 132. The captain of the steamer Star of Ireland, upon the arrival of that vessel, reported that he had passed the Volturno 120 miles west southwest of the place where she was abandoned and that she was still burning. A few days later members of the crew of a passing steamer went on board the derelict and opened her sea-cocks and left her sinking.

Shipwrecked Crew Saved at Sea

THE accompanying photograph is one of the most remarkable pictures ever made at sea. It shows the schooner Marjory Brown actually sinking, while her crew, in a lifeboat, is struggling to pull away from her. The suction caused by the sinking of a vessel of as great tonnage as this schooner must have been immense, and the escape of the crew is regarded as little short of miraculous. When their ship went down, the crew in the lifeboat found themselves on the very edge of the vortex, and it was from that perilous position that they were rescued by the North German Lloyd steamship Berlin. The schooner disappeared from sight just nine minutes after her crew abandoned her. In less than half an hour they were on board the liner, from whose deck the photograph was taken.

THE FOUR-MASTED SCHOONER MARJORY BROWN SINKING AT SEA

About two hundred miles off Sandy Hook an eighty-mile gale struck the schooner. For thirty-six hours the captain and crew fought to keep her afloat, but her seams had started and the pumps were soon disabled, so she filled rapidly. The crew was about to leave her when they sighted the Berlin and flew distress signals. The rescuing liner arrived just in time to save the helpless men from the awful experience of days in an open boat on the winter sea.

The Redemption of New York

TAMMANY is overthrown. In the election of November 4, the corrupt boss system was overwhelmingly repudiated by the people, who turned Tammany out of office and put up the bars so that its followers will no longer feed fat on public graft. Men of character and ability, who are pledged to honest government, are to be placed in control of the city's affairs after January 1, and a clean administration is assured.

The popular rebellion has swept out Boss Murphy and his cohorts from all of the city offices: Mayor, aldermen, assemblymen, borough officials, and Board of Estimate and Apportionment. In the last-named—which was the key to the graft situation—Tammany will have but one solitary vote, and that one doubtful. It is a riddance as complete as that which followed the uprising against the rule of Tweed.

New York is to be congratulated on this triumph of civic righteousness. It is a new and convincing demonstration of the fact that when the public conscience is fully aroused, a great municipality can be swept clean of all those vicious influences that degrade politics and exist on public plunder. But Tammany, while defeated and demoralized, is not destroyed. There have been occasions in the past when the corrupt organization which fittingly has the tiger for its emblem was thoroughly whipped at the polls, and when it lost practically all of its patronage and its opportunities for plunder. When the Tweed ring was smashed and its satellites scattered over the face of the earth, Tammany went out into the wilderness for a season—but it came back. Again, in 1879, it was stripped of its offices—but again it came back. Later, when it bolted the State ticket and ran its boss for governor, it was beaten with many stripes and went out into the desert and fed on the husks for several "lean" years—but still it came back; back to its old tactics of graft and corruption, to its business of promoting lawlessness, of making the city treasury its private feeding-trough, of profitably controlling courts, departments, legislators, police, public improvements and franchises; of shielding vice and crime, and of making the government of New York a byword of shame.

And Tammany will come back again, unless the people themselves decide permanently to eliminate bossism with its evil train from municipal and State government. By and by Tammany will come knocking for admission and recognition at the doors of State conventions. But it no longer represents, in the true sense, any political party. It has proved itself unworthy to sit in a convention hall side by side with decent delegates. If branded as irregular and denied participation in conventions henceforth, Tammany would become an outlaw, and, save by the will of the people, it could never again come back as a power in the metropolis or in the Empire State. The citizens of New York have learned the lesson how to take care of their own affairs. If they do their whole duty now, energetically and thoroughly, Tammany will have nothing but "lean" years and defeat hereafter. It should never come back.

A Deserved Rebuke

"AMERICANS do not recognize the value of religious work which cannot be shown by statistics." "When they preach Christianity they do not put so much stress upon truth itself as upon the influence which truth has upon politics and society." "The Bible teaches that God is a Spirit, but Americans do not believe in his power if it is not shown by forms and statistics."

These startling words appear in an article written for the Christian Work by Kanzo Uchimura, a converted Japanese. Dr. Lynch, the editor, dissents from some of Mr. Uchimura's statements, and from his thesis that American efforts to Christianize Asia are a failure. He states that "many Japanese take just the opposite view as to the success of American missions."

Yet there can be no doubt that this friend from the Orient has administered a just rebuke to American Christians. It is only too true that we have paid more attention to the whirlwind, the fire and the earthquake than to the "still small voice."

"Take time to be holy." It requires time. In our furious haste to get results, results in numbers of converts and numbers of dollars, we are in danger of missing the real essence of religion, which is personal communion with a personal God.

It is true we must be active. It is true we must be zealous to win souls. It is true we must try to improve social conditions. But we must remember that it is God's power, not man's, that brings to pass the things that count for eternity. If we lose our hold on God, if we are too busy to talk with him, if we get our eyes upon the work so that we forget to keep "looking unto Jesus," we shall suddenly realize that our work, while it may have had much noise and apparent bigness, amounts to nothing after all. "Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth." "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God!" We are to win men, not to the church, but to God. We are to show them how to satisfy their hearts with his love. Only as we ourselves are in communion with him, only as our eyes are beholding him, only as our own souls are drinking the satisfying draught of his love can we win others to him and do work that shall stand. There is more than chance in the exquisite words of the psalmist: "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us. And establish thou the work of our hands upon us. Yea, the work of our hands establish thou it."

The American church should be grateful for this needed warning from our brother from Japan. It is a message from the East to the West which we needed to hear. It corresponds with the message of our Book and our Saviour. If we heed it, it will, in the end, make us more, not less, "efficient" in his service.

The Sin of Indolence

CAPTAIN SCOTT, the Antarctic hero, who died amid the polar ice, in his last letter to his wife wrote: "Make our boy interested in natural history if you can. It is better than games. Keep him in the open air. Above all, you must guard him against indolence. Make him a strenuous man. The great God has called me. Take comfort in that I die in peace with the world and myself, and not afraid." The captain, with death numbing his brain and grasping his hand, devoted the last moments to setting down a thought for the benefit of his son. It is one which parents everywhere might ponder to advantage. "Guard against indolence; make him a strenuous man." In these progressive days, the youth who cannot be aroused early to understand that life is a struggle in which the trained, the active, energetic and industrious have all the advantage, will realize sadly the lack of that training farther on. Keep the boys and girls busy, give them laudable ambitions and an aim and purpose in life, teach them the preciousness of education, the dignity of work and the value of acquiring industrious habits in youth. Then when the real battle of life begins, they will be prepared for it and will enter it with the gladness of courage in their hearts and a song of confidence upon their lips.

How You Can Help Us

IT HAS always been our custom to be quite frank and outspoken in addressing the members of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. We take this privilege now to remind you that the time has come when you can help us, help yourselves, and help several hundred thousand other readers of this journal by sending along your renewal of subscription NOW, instead of waiting until the actual date of expiry, a few weeks hence.

Why do we ask this?

Because, by complying with our request, you will greatly forward the business of our Subscription Department, which becomes very large at the renewal season. As you know, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD circulation is now a big proposition, and it keeps on growing, growing, growing! What with the flood of renewals, premium books, Almanacs, and the like, the biggest end of it is just ahead of us.

Every reader who anticipates his subscription by renewing a week or two in advance loses nothing and enables us to get through the mass of detail work in better shape, with more uniform, business-like accuracy, and greater satisfaction all around. Besides, it relieves the congestion and does away with the overtime and fatiguing nightwork for hundreds of our employees.

If you agree—as we think you do—we'll be glad to have your renewal within a day or two, and we thank you very heartily in advance.

Indian Summer

WE SHALL let aviators severely alone in these paragraphs. They do not quite own the air as yet—nor claim to. There will always be the angels to reckon with, anyway. And perhaps angels may have something to do with what is in mind just now. Have you noticed what is in the air, particularly? It is always there at this time of year. You notice it first as a tint in the atmosphere, like a reflection from vast forests of turning leaf, shot through with gleams from acres of reddening bush. The sunsets now are a subtle delight. The very frostiness has a caress in it. It is indefinable, but it is there like a memory in the heart.

Then you notice it with a feeling of satisfaction, as with a piece of work well done. This, too, comes not from within, but like another emanation as from great tracts of land resting from labor, their harvests gleaned and stored. If you live in a city, and pass along the produce district, you walk between walls of fragrant apples and turnips and carrots and winter pears. You get a vision of hurrying trains of cars loaded with the fruits of the operations of that mighty army more necessary to the nation than ever its military forces can be, the farmers. And if you live in the country, you walk abroad at dusk through the deserted encampments, where amid the tented cornstalks yellow pumpkins, like lanterns, have been left still gleaming in the pale moonlight.

And then, this that is in the air comes to our senses like a sound of music. If your soul is attuned, if your heart is not clogged with greed and doubt, you can hear it: a sound of a great human note of gratefulness for the months of partial relaxation while the earth labored, gratefulness for the long months of renewed effort and toil and accomplishment that come while nature rests. A sense of having come safely through an annual crisis, of having one's feet once more on the trail, of being again in one's duly appointed place ready for orders.

And last, there is an anticipation that comes to us from this that is in the air, a sense of something worth while coming, something good ahead. A spirit of comradeship takes possession of us, and a wish to do things for others, to remember and give and share. There is a sense of increasing peace on earth and good will among men.

It is in the air. It is Indian Summer, Thanksgiving time, the forerunner of Christmas, all combined. A name for it? Why not call it the rustling of angels' wings?

Bichloride Poison by Mistake

THE fight for life of B. Sanders Walker, the banker of Macon, Ga., last May, after his poison by mistake by bichloride of mercury, has just been made by Isaac Levy of Brooklyn under the same circumstances. Mr. Levy, a retired clothing merchant of Brooklyn, who had not been in good health for some time, arose from his bed and went to the bath room to get some headache tablets which usually afforded him relief. It was night, the light was down, and he took four tablets from a bottle of bichloride of mercury which stood next to the one containing his headache remedy. He did not discover his mistake for some time, when he felt strangely, and sent for a physician, who, suspecting poison by mistake, instituted a search and found the facts. Immediately every remedy possible was administered. Soon he was informed that there was no cure for him, and that, though he must linger for days, the deadly work could not be undone. The unfortunate man was perfectly cool and composed. He called his wife and as many of his twelve children as could be summoned, and told them of the fatal consequences of his mistake, and commended them for their affection and loyalty to him, and expressed his sorrow at having to leave them, but said he would yield to the inevitable as a man, and told them to bear up bravely and to follow out the duty that was left to them. He told them that the physician had assured him that his death would be painless. He sent for his rabbi to confer with him in reference to his soul, and for his lawyer to write his will, and after their visits he said he was ready for his fate. As the days wore on, however, and he felt so little inconvenience or pain, he said he thought he would recover, and set his will and wits to work in the battle, but his conflict was an unequal one. Sin is a deadly virus for which there is no earthly remedy. Christ is the only cure. Sin, like the poison that induces a fatal slumber, and Christ's salvation from such a death are thus described by the apostle:

Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light. (Eph. 5: 14.)

The Valuable Birch Tree

THE switch and the schoolmaster of olden times have been so intimately related that the word birch and primitive school punishment were well nigh synonyms. The birch tree has had many other uses and has had a splendid history. They have been of sufficient importance to claim the attention of the Department of Agriculture at Washington, which has just issued a bulletin on the subject which is of deep interest. Sir Alexander Mackenzie hunted whales in a birch canoe. He found the animals at the mouth of the Mackenzie River, and perhaps luckily did not strike any of them. It is difficult to estimate the value of the service of the birch bark canoe in the discovery, exploration, development, and settlement of the northern part of the continent from the Arctic Circle to the Great Lakes and southward. For a century and a half the birch canoe threading its way through the lakes and rivers carried civilization where no other boat could go. The birch tree has uses now from church pews to kitchen tables, and from organ pipes and musical instruments to newel posts. It furnishes cradles for the young and coffins for the dead. Eleven thousand cords of the wood go to New England each year to be made into shoe pegs and shanks. Forty-five million board feet of the wood is put on the market each year. There are nine species of birch in this country, but sweet, yellow, paper and river birch are most used. Paper birch is one of the few American species with a hold on the forest stronger than it had when the continent was discovered. It comes in after a forest fire and it has taken possession of enough land to cover hundreds of square miles. There is this mention of the provision of forest trees for useful purposes:

I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil tree; I will set in the desert the fir tree, and the pine, and the box tree together. (Isa. 41: 19.)

To Seek Treasure Islands

IT IS said that a junior at Harvard University is to start for South America soon in search of two islands he believes to abound in fabulous wealth. His grandfather in his will made mention of these islands, declaring them to be rich in gold dust and pearls, and requesting him to go and possess them before he shall reach the age of twenty-one. It is a question whether in the long run it would be the best thing for the moral or even financial welfare of the young man to fall upon such a fortune which he had done so little to earn. The likelihood is that he will be out his expenses and fail to find the treasure islands. We suspect he will do better in money matters in after life to pursue vigorously the remainder of his college course at Harvard, and he will certainly secure a treasure of truth more valuable than gold dust or pearls. This is the opinion of the wise man who said:

How much better is it to get wisdom than gold! and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver! (Prov. 16: 16.)

AMERICA'S ONLY EGYPTIAN SPHINX

THE Sphinx of Rameses II, brought from Egypt by University of Pennsylvania officials, has found a resting-place in front of the Archeological Department of that seat of learning. This is the first sphinx to be brought to this country. It was found in the ruins of the city of Memphis, the ancient capital of Egypt. It is of red granite, twelve feet five inches in length and seven feet one and one-half inches in height. Rameses II is generally remembered as the mightiest of the Pharaohs. In the creation of a god men's minds have always associated humanity with something above and stronger. The Egyptians made a sphinx with humanity in conjunction with tremendous animal power, having the head of a man and the body of a beast. There were wisdom and power, but no heart and no response to the pitiful cry of the soul for the solution of life's mysteries. For thousands of years generations of men and women worshiped this sphinx, which never dried a tear, hushed a cry, lifted a burden, or uttered one whisper in solving the riddle of life, being merciless in its fatalism. This god has been set down upon our soil to teach by contrast more strongly the religion of the West, not man-made, but by divine appointment a conjunction of humanity with divinity in the Babe of the Virgin, himself the Son of God, whose religion is one of mercy and love, and solves the riddle of this earthly existence, revealing the mystery of the world to come. The prophet thus describes the removal of the idols of Egypt at the presence of the Lord: "Behold, the Lord rideth upon a swift cloud, and shall come into Egypt: and the idols of Egypt shall be moved at his presence, and the heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it." (Isa. 19: 1.)

Promotes Gambling and Science

ONE of the strangest paradoxes, in fact positive contradictions in character and life, is seen in the career of Albert, Prince of Monaco, in his promotion of gambling on a colossal scale, and of science in a devoted and efficient manner. He is the ruler of a little principality which is at once one of the most beautiful and vicious places in Europe. Men and women go there to have the fun of playing the games, and there they part with their fortunes. The larger part of the enormous sum derived from this place the prince devotes to the study of the sea; its mountains and vales, its vegetable growths, and the creatures that make their homes and living in its depths. He delivers public lectures on the subject, a number of which he has given in this country. This patronage of the highest in the literary and scientific realm and partnership with that which is most dishonest and vile illustrates the fact that good is often done by money wickedly made, and also the fact that no scientific help or advancement can atone for the robbing of the people by gambling, and that ends however beneficent or good are never justified by evil means. Up to a century or so ago, it was not thought so bad a thing to raise money by certain forms of gambling for the promotion of benevolent or even religious schemes, but the standard of morals has been so elevated that gambling for any purpose has been outlawed in most civilized countries, and such places as Monte Carlo are counted a disgrace and crime by the world. With his intellectual impulses and plans it would be well for the principality and the conscience of the prince of Monaco to listen to these words:

Ye shall not steal, neither deal falsely, neither lie one to another. (Lev. 19: 11.)

Her Dog Not Admitted

A WELL-DRESSED woman in good financial circumstances entered a sleeping car the other day and asked the conductor to let her have the drawing-room for the trip. He refused to do so, saying that her basket and dog made it impossible for him to let her have the room. The woman became livid with rage, and on her arrival in New York she wrote a caustic criticism on the rules of the company to one of the city dailies. Among other things the letter said: "I have made the same trip in the sleeper when a sick baby in the car cried piteously in a nerve-racking way the entire time. Why should this be tolerated, and not a perfectly clean and quiet little dog?" This foolish and harsh letter expresses the feelings of a class of women fortunately small who take dogs as a substitute for children, and lavish the maternal love that God intended to be given to children upon the canine pets. The average American mother revolts against this prostitution of maternal love. Some upon whom Providence has not bestowed the blessing of children have adopted the children of relatives or friends, and that has been a better substitute than pet dogs. The psalmist has thus described the blessing of children in the family:

Thy children shall be like olive plants round about thy table. (Ps. 128: 3.)

Character the Great Thing

COLONEL ROOSEVELT in his South American tour spoke before the government university at Sao Paulo the other day on "Character and Civilization." He said some things of universal significance. Among them: "Resolution, courage, energy, power of self-control combined with fearlessness in taking the initiative and assuming responsibility; a just regard for the rights of others, together with unflinching determination to succeed, no matter what obstacles have to be beaten down. There is, moreover, one quality too often wholly lacking in men of high intellectual ability, without which real character cannot exist, namely, the fundamental gift of common sense. Character must ever outrank genius and intellect. Intellect is a useful servant, but an evil master unless itself mastered by character. This is as true of nations as of individuals. American republics north and south have often shown a forgetfulness of this precept. A republic could prosper although the average man were not brilliant. A republic could not prosper if its average man became infirm of mind and soul, if he feared hard labor, if he sought to rise by ways that represent wrong to his weaker brethren." The address closed with the emphasis on this fact: that

The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish. (Isa. 60: 12.)

THE SWARMING OF A NATION

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

EVERY Christian patriot should hail this lesson as a fitting illustration at this Thanksgiving season of the crossing to this country of the Puritans, who were to play such a large part in the making of America the modern land of promise. The picture presented of God's chosen people swarming across the Jordan, while the priests stood upon the bed of the river bearing the sacred Ark of the Covenant, must serve as a reminder of those who came into this land seeking religious liberty. Let us consider the Bible story briefly that we may have time to see God quite as clearly as the God of the waters and the God of nations in newer chapters of our own and of the world's history.

"This day will I begin to magnify thee: . . . that they may know that as I was with Moses so I will be with thee." This day, Thanksgiving Sunday, we may well remember that the history of any great period of a nation's life is usually in large part the biography of some patriot who devotes himself so self-forgetfully to what he regards as the chief interest of his people that they in turn can never forget him. These men are not always the greatest of their time in rank, wealth, intellect or opportunity, but greatest only in devotion to God or man or both. It cannot be too greatly emphasized that if we are not eminent in gifts we may be eminent in graces; that if we are not great on earth in fame we may be great in heaven through faithfulness. It is especially notable that the greatest glory of both Moses and Joshua was that men saw that God was with them and they were with God.

"When the soles of the feet of the priests shall rest in the waters of Jordan, that the waters of Jordan shall be cut off." This was to be a sign of victory over the giants and the walled cities of Canaan that the fathers of these Israelites had so feared forty years before. It was to be, too, a sign of greater faith in the people, that they would march right into the swollen torrent of Jordan (see verse 15), believing that God would cut off the waters and fulfil again, as at the Red Sea, his promise, "When thou passest through the waters, they shall not come nigh thee." It was a sign, also, that the God of waters would give to them the victory over every obstacle they should encounter in the new land. The entire story of the lesson is made up of God's promise that Israel should pass through on dry land and the historic record that the event exactly fulfilled that promise.

So began the great history of little Palestine as God's country, one of the great little nations of the world. As we look back through history, it is astounding how many of the great nations of the world have been its little nations. Greece, Rome, Venice, Britain, Holland, and New England in the New World, have all proved this fact. Closest and of most interest at this season is the history of New England. With its few acres, but with its unlimited devotion to justice and to righteousness, New England has proved mightier in the forming of our nation than all the vast areas of New France and New Spain. Through untold perils of persecution and of the sea, and of contact with savage foes, God led a chosen few to settle in New England, that their ideas, permeating the nation that was to be, should make it a promised land in modern times to millions deprived of religious and civil liberty.

We are writing this lesson on the day following a visit to the little group of cottages opposite St. Peter's Church in Leyden, where, for nine years before the first voyage of the Mayflower, Pastor John Robinson trained in personal godliness and Christian politics the exiled Puritans of Boston, Lincolnshire, England, who had fled with him from persecution in their native land to safety in more tolerant Holland. These two cities, British Boston and Dutch Leyden, are two of the springs in which American history finds its chief sources. Since that, from many lands have come the streams and rivulets which make the Uncle Sam of to-day a composite of many nations Americanized by Anglo-Saxon institutions and by the Anglo-Saxon ideas which dominated the Pilgrim of the North as well as the gayer Cavalier of the South.

THE ARK PASSES OVER THE JORDAN

Every branch of the Christian church, in varying degree, has been a lighthouse to young and old on land and sea in commercial, political and social life. But the Puritans of Boston were destined to build a lighthouse so lofty on the rocky shores of New England that its light should be seen across the world and draw the lonely fugitives from persecution to a safe haven of civil and religious liberty.

In the basement of the ancient city hall of old Boston we saw the narrow dungeons in which were imprisoned the Puritans who made up the second Mayflower company, and who having fled from persecution were brought back through the treachery of the captain of the vessel that he might receive the reward that was offered by their persecutors. The public sentiment shown at the trial of these unfortunates was so strongly on their side that they were acquitted and permitted quickly to resume their voyage to America. It is little wonder that they named their new home Boston, in memory of the city, a part of their homeland, and friendliest of all in its public sentiment to their great quest for liberty.

Not alone by its hospitality to the oppressed Pilgrim Fathers does Leyden furnish illustrations appropriate to the story of the Hebrew crossing of the Jordan and to Thanksgiving time. Its own victorious resistance to siege when a persecuting Spanish king sought to starve it into surrender of its Protestant faith and civil liberty shows that God, as the Lord of the waters, no less miraculously than at the parting of the Jordan came to their rescue. To one who believes that God made land and sea and by his forces controls them, why should it seem an incredible thing that he should have intensified the winds and tides over against Leyden for the deliverance of Holland from a modern Pharaoh, as he did at the Red Sea to drive back the Egyptians?

Let us recall in condensed form the wonderful story, which should be read in full in every home, from Motley's Dutch Republic. "Better a drowned land than a lost land," replied the people of Leyden, when the Prince of Orange proposed to pierce the dikes and besiege the Spanish besiegers with the waves of the ocean, and on those waves bring in a fleet of reinforcements. The dikes were cut, but at first the ocean covered the land only a few inches—not enough to float the friendly fleet. Meanwhile the besieged city was at its last gasp. While prayerfully waiting for the wind to blow from the west to increase the depth of water necessary to the further progress of the fleet, they were literally starving. At last the wind for which they were praying came to their relief in the form of a violent gale, and the ocean, rising over the earth, swept in unrestrained power across the broken dikes and made it possible for the fleet of two hundred ships, transporting 2,500 veterans, all commanded by Admiral Boisot, to relieve Leyden on the following day. The Spaniards had fled, panic-stricken, during the darkness of the night, many being drowned in the rush of waters.

Admiral Boisot, stepping ashore, was welcomed by the magistrates, and a solemn procession was immediately formed and nearly every living person within the walls, magistrates, citizens, emaciated guards, sailors, soldiers, women, children, repaired without delay to the great church, the admiral leading the way. The starving and heroic city, which had been so firm in its resistance to an earthly king, now bent itself in humble gratitude before the King of kings. After prayers, the whole vast congregation joined in the thanksgiving hymn. Thousands of voices raised the song, but few were able to carry it to its conclusion, for the universal emotion, deepened by the music, became too full for utterance. The hymn was abruptly suspended while the multitude wept like children. On the fifth of February, 1575, barely four months after the scene just described, the city of Leyden had crowned itself with flowers, and, after a solemn religious celebration in that same church, a grand procession was formed, which moved slowly up and down the different streets and along the quiet canals of the city on its way for the founding of the University of Leyden as a tribute of gratitude from all Holland for the heroism shown by the devoted people of Leyden.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—IN A LETTER from Sacramento, Calif., a business man writes to our Round Table as follows: "I have been interested in your Sunday school lessons in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and have been helped thereby in [illegible] with a class of boys. Out of your broad experience it has occurred to me that you might be able to offer me a few suggestions looking toward the enlistment of influential men in the work of the Sunday school. This is one of our problems out here, and your response will be much appreciated."

In response to this request, we wish to say to him and to others interested in the same problem that the best way to enlist influential men in the work of the Sunday school is for pastor and church officers to go to them confidentially asking them to become teachers of boys if they are suited for that work; or if not, to become members of organized men's classes such as ought to be found in every Sunday school, which are the best possible means of holding such men in the Sunday school if they are well managed, and especially if they are well taught. Ordinarily pastors and officers and others are too ready to accept the excuse that business men are too tired and need the day for rest. In fact, a free man does not need to wear out his whole energy in making money, but is in duty bound to do his share in the moral uplift of the community, especially in the safeguarding of boys. He should also be reminded that the best rest on Sunday is in such activities as set his mind moving in new channels, turning from the ordinary work of money-making. It is those who thus engage their Sabbaths who go back to the Monday task in the best condition, according to the testimony of great employers. The business man should be approached confidently in the spirit of Nelson, adapting it to religious duties: "God expects every man to do his duty."

Another letter from California comes from a college professor. He asks for information regarding class organization. The word "organization" almost tells a story. I mean that the Sunday school class should organize itself as a sort of religious club, with president, recording secretary, corresponding secretary, treasurer and one or more vice-presidents, and committees for various forms of work—one committee on new members, in which all members should co-operate; another committee, co-operating with the pastor, in rallying men to the Sunday night service; another on visiting the sick, and others for various altruistic purposes. The whole class, if it be a class of men, should be federated with other classes in the community for social betterment though not for political purposes.

But class organization is quite as important for boys of fourteen to hold them in the Sunday school as they begin to feel their coming manhood. A class of boys of about that age should be organized in the Sunday school and the organization should continue, next to the church itself and a part of it, to which they will have a lifelong attachment.

T THE DYING OF THE YEAR

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

HE days are short now and very dark in the late afternoons. Leaves—the silent messengers of a bitter season—ne fluttering down, a wonderful mix-:e of gold and scarlet and russet. e mountains, off in the distance, ange from green to red and from red a dreary burnt-out brown, and the rquoise skies of an Indian summer de to a dull, sad gray.

For the year is nearing its close and e season is dying.

I was taking a walk one day through e dreary autumn countryside—all one in the deepening dusk. And mehow I began to wonder about life in its twilight time. And I thought: "How gloomy and terrible it must be nen one is old! And how cheerless e world must seem!"

Just then a band of radiant color rept across the sky, for it was sunt. Delicate rose-pink and gold swept e grayness far into the mist of a rgotten memory. The brown leaves led on the ground seemed to take on sudden radiance, and the bare trees ere glowing like bronze columns. teadily the light grew until all the orld was as softly shaded and glowng as the heart of an opal. Then ddenly the glory faded and the sky rew dark.

I hurried on, for the night was very ear and I wanted to reach my home. s I hurried, I tried to analyze my eelings.

"This," I thought, "is like the end of fe. The dull gray of twilight, with burst of color at the end, and then arkness." For the sunset glory had eft me strangely crushed—a small rotesting atom drifting through a illion miles of cold, unsympathetic pace.

I reached the door of my home, but paused on the threshold and glanced ut once more into the dark of the ight time. It was very calm and eaceful. The trees were scarcely listinguishable in their ugly outlines nd the leaves on the ground might ave been almost any color. And then looked up into the black arch of the ky. There, all alone, a tiny star winkled back at me—calm and unafraid. So I went into the house strangely comforted.

For though the sunset color may change to darkness, a star, the star of hope and love, will rise and gleam through eternity.

Oliver Wendell Holmes describes an elderly man, the only one left of his generation, as the last leaf upon the bough. He says in a verse of his poem:

> And he shakes his feeble head,
> That it seems as if he said,
> "They are gone."

Perhaps if my sunset and my twilight and my star spoke truly to me, the old man did not say:

"They are gone."

Maybe he smiled deep in the bottom of his soul and said:

"They are waiting."

For, even then, his star of hope was shining behind some sheltering cloud.

One day when I was very small, I went out into the woods to hunt for chestnuts. Three little girls went with me, all armed with tiny baskets. On the way we stopped by our pet violet bed and unthinkingly stooped down to look for blossoms. But the place that had been a riot of color and perfume in May was a dried-up bunch of leaves in November.

Little Grace, the smallest one of our party, sat down and began to cry from disappointment.

"Our pretty vi'lets are gone away," she wailed, "and we can't pick them any more."

But Betty, the oldest one, had no time to waste on tears and unprofitable sentimentality. She was fast filling her little basket with the fat, brown chestnuts that were strewn over the withered grass.

"Baby!" she sniffed at the sobbing child. "Stop crying and pick up these nice nuts. 'Course they're not so pretty as flowers, but they taste great!" Suddenly she turned around and faced the little girl. "Why do you s'pose those flowers are dead?" she said earnestly. "It's 'cause God wanted 'em in heaven."

It was a pretty thought that the tiny girl voiced so simply. A thought almost too beautiful to realize, but it was—it is true. For when the autumn of life comes we must remember that the flowers of life's springtime have not disappeared into a black, unfathomed future. They have only gone because God wants them with him—in heaven, giving instead the "season of mists and the mellow fruitfulness" of the soul that has learned life's lessons well.

I was calling one day—calling on a little lady who had long since passed her three score and ten years. The season was late autumn and the little lady's thoughts matched the world.

"I hate this time of year," she told me almost crossly. "I hate it more than I can tell. It is so hopeless—and sad. The trees are standing up like cold, shivering ghosts, and the flowers and leaves are dead. Even the sky is gloomy and the air has a mist in it. I love the springtime and the summer, but, oh, I wish that the autumn would never come!"

I left the little lady still mourning over the Lord's seasons, a frown on her usually sweet face. And as I walked down the bare avenue I thought of an almost similar scene with my grandmother.

When a girl once spoke to her about the dreary autumn weather, she said:

"My dear, this weather isn't one bit cheerless. Why, the flowers and the leaves are just asleep—waiting for the springtime to come. To me the autumn is one of the most beautiful seasons of the year, for, if the earth never slept, how could there be an awakening—a resurrection?"

For always at the end of the year comes the wonderful sunset and the gleaming star.

> When the autumn time of your life is here
> And the blossoms are turning brown:
> When the saddest season of all the year
> Is sending a message down,
> When the last leaf blows from a withered bough,
> And rests on the frosty sod—
> Send your prayers up high past the boundles sky,
> Till they rest at the throne of God.

GOSPEL MISSIONS UNION CELEBRATION

WHATEVER doubt or difficulty there may be connected with the subject of the union of Christian churches generally, there is no misgiving or hesitation on the part of that aggressive wing of the church that is engaged in Gospel Mission work.

These devoted people realize that God has placed upon them the large responsibility of taking the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the vast masses of the "common people" outside the Christian church, and especially to those who are lowest down in the social scale. To do this work effectively a union of forces is imperatively necessary, hence the inauguration, on September 17, of the International Union of Gospel Missions, under the genial presidency of Mr. Sidney Whittemore of New York City. The first annual convention of the newborn union will be held at Cedar Rapids, Iowa. The officers are: President, Mr. Sidney Whittemore; vice-presidents, Rev. Thomas B. Ironside, Morristown, N. J., Thomas L. Fretz, Germantown, Pa., Miss Sara Wray, New York, Harry D. Gordon, Washington, Obadiah Dugan, Charleston, S. C., Oliver C. Elliott, Boston, F. K. Ward, Cedar Rapids, Ia., Rev. John G. Hallimond, D.D., New York; treasurer, Mr. John H. Wyburn, New York; secretary, Mrs. John H. Wyburn, 316 Water Street, New York.

One of the first acts of the new organization was the passing of a resolution providing for the creation of local branches in the large centers of population. The first of such local organizations to appear was that of the New York District, which was launched with great enthusiasm on Tuesday, October 28.

MIDNIGHT GOSPEL SERVICE CONDUCTED BY THE NEW YORK MISSIONS UNION

The meetings were held at the Rescue Society Midnight Mission, in the old Chinese Theater, and it is safe to say that of the many interesting events that have happened in that strange, weird place, none have been more striking than this. The superintendent of the mission, Mr. T. J. Noonan, spared no effort and displayed remarkable genius in the arrangements he made for the entertainment of his guests.

The representatives of the various missions partook of a marvelous luncheon at the Chinese Oriental Restaurant in Pell Street, and when fifty lusty voices united in singing "Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow," the scores of curiosity-seeking diners on the floor below wondered at the strange concatenation of circumstances in which they found themselves.

After luncheon the delegates repaired to the theater and went through the business of organizing the local district union. The following officers were chosen: Rev. J. G. Hallimond, D.D., president; Miss Sara Wray, vice-president; Thomas J. Noonan, secretary; Rev. T. C. R. Horsfield, treasurer; executive committee, John H. Wyburn, chairman, W. C. Yerkes, T. B. Ironside, Rev. John Callahan, Mrs. C. E. White, William McQuere, Rev. George Avery. After the business session a Gospel service was held, lasting several hours. Dr. Hallimond presided. Prominent among the speakers were the Rev. G. S. Avery, Rev. T. B. Ironside, Rev. T. C. Roberts-Horsfield, Rev. C. W. Simpson of Bridgeport and Mr. Whittemore. Miss Sara Wray gave the "invitation" almost at midnight, and some twenty men responded.

Meetings of the Union will be held monthly at the various missions.

CONRAD FREDERICK WYNEKEN

THIS is the story of a noble servant of God, the story of a man whose life and labors were marked by an utter forgetting of self and a burning desire, yea, a consuming zeal, to serve the kingdom of God and his fellow men. His name is Conrad Frederick Wyneken, and he is termed the "Father of German-American Lutheran Missions." On the pages of the history of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other States his name is inscribed as one of its first presidents and greatest men.

His field of labor was principally Ohio and Indiana. He spent many years on horseback, riding up and down, crossing and recrossing those States, preaching the Gospel wherever he found Germans, strengthening, helping, and gathering them into congregations. The hardships endured were those of the real pioneer. Often when night came he found himself without shelter, far from human abode. Nothing daunted, he would tie his horse to a tree and sleep under the canopy of the dark sky, with his saddle for a pillow.

His last pastorate was in Cleveland, Ohio, at old Trinity Church. It was here that the famous "shirt" incident occurred. Wyneken entered the home of a very poor family to make his accustomed sick call upon the husband and father. He found that the angel of death had preceded him. Kind neighbors were busy preparing the body for burial. But they could not find a white shirt among the departed one's scant wardrobe, and were embarrassed. Wyneken said to them, "I know where a white shirt is." He left the house, hastened into the woodshed in the rear of the yard, from which he emerged a few moments later with a clean white shirt in his hands. But his coat was buttoned up to his chin. It was only through an accident that it ever became known that Wyneken had given his own shirt as a funeral shroud.

Another interesting anecdote: It was the ardent wish of his Cleveland congregation to see Wyneken's threadbare black "best suit" replaced by a new one. But they knew that their pastor had no money, and that, when he did have money, it soon found its way to the needy. And so they secretly raised a collection of $40, a large sum of money in those days for a rather poor congregation. Deacon Voss was appointed a committee of one to hand this love-gift to Wyneken and to impress upon him that it was to be used for a new suit of clothes and nothing else.

The congregation waited anxiously from week to week to see their beloved pastor appear in a new suit. But in vain. Finally, Deacon Voss took heart and asked his pastor for an explanation as to whether he had ordered the new suit for the $40. "New suit?" exclaimed Pastor Wyneken, "those forty dollars? Why, did you not see that poor woman who came to visit me as you left the house on the day you brought that money? Her husband was sick. The rent was overdue. The children had nothing to eat. No money for medicine. The need was great and pressing. I gave her those forty dollars, for surely she needed the money more than I. And this suit is still good enough for me." Then, noticing a look of displeasure on Voss's countenance, and remembering that his ancient indestructible corduroy trousers were particularly disliked by many of his parishioners, he added: "Voss, our bountiful Lord can repay me that money in a double measure, if I need it; and he can give me a new pair of trousers in addition."

As they passed the post office, the postmaster called, "Pastor, here is a letter for you." Letters were rare in those days. "It is from Germany," the postmaster added. Yes, it was from his brothers; and it contained a money order for $80 "in order that he might not starve in the wilds of America." Eighty dollars! When had Wyneken held so much money in his hands? He showed the order to Voss with the remark, "Do you now believe, you doubting Thomas?"

They resumed their walk. Presently they were accosted by a merchant tailor with the greeting, "Pastor, please come into my store." Wyneken and Voss entered. And the tailor continued, "I have a pair of trousers for a man in the country; he is a man of your build. You would do me a great favor by trying them on, for if they fit you I know they will fit him." Wyneken thought this was expecting rather much of him. But the man pleaded so earnestly that he consented, though very reluctantly. In a little booth in the rear of the store he removed his old corduroy friends and put on the new black trousers. As he stepped forth into the light, both the tailor and Voss declared it to be a perfect fit.

"Well, how do you like the trousers?" the tailor asked. "This is a fine piece of goods, and fine for a preacher like you." "That it is, but such a fine pair of trousers I never owned. They are too fine for me," replied Wyneken. "Well, pastor," announced the tailor, "the trousers are yours; they were made for you and—are paid."

Wyneken refused to accept the gift. He hastened back to the booth to exchange them for his old friends, but the corduroy trousers were gone. He never saw them again.

As Wyneken and Voss passed out of the door the deacon's eyes were filled with tears. He had learned a lesson of trust in the Lord which he never forgot. REV. H. P. ECKHARDT, D.D.

RIGHT LITTLE CHINA ORPHANS

MISSIONARY S. N. LONG, of Tsingkiangpu, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on October 1: "I am sending you e pictures of our boys in the RISTIAN HERALD Orphanage here. have forty-five boys in the insti- on. They are all making very d progress, both in school and in industrial department. They are eiving a good practical education thorough Christian training. ose who show the capacity to take education are allowed to go into boys' school of our station. We e some bright boys taking this rse now, and we are hoping that m among the number we may have e much needed pastors and Chris- workers. We ask the prayers of Christian friends at home for this stitution, which is their work and rs."

Rev. E. F. Knickerbocker, superin- ident of the Ningpo Orphanage, ites:

"I am in the health resort of Mo- nshan for the summer, several hun- ed miles from Ningpo. During the st half year eleven boys of Compas- on Orphanage have united with the urch. On April 27, the day set apart r special prayers for China by re- est of the government, it was my ivilege to be at our Kaogyiao urch near the orphanage, which is me eight miles west from Ningpo. e usual forenoon preaching service d the afternoon Sunday school and ristian Endeavor meeting were all t aside, and the time was given to ging and exhortation. Several of e boys took turns in playing the or- n for the hymns. They never have usic before them, but they play cor- ctly. Instruction in this line is ven by Mr. and Mrs. Tsu. I wonder some one could not be tempted to ve the orphanage a new organ. An organ, to stand this climate, must be specially built.

"Recently we had an orphan exhibition in Ningpo City, when Mr. Tsu and twenty of the boys showed several hundred people what had been done at the orphanage. The thing that attracted most attention was the playing on the organ by three boys at once. The center boy pumped with both feet and each boy at the side helped him with one foot, then by a proper division their six little hands were able to play all the parts of the music. This was a surprise to me as well as to others.

"When one sees these boys and thinks of them as to their condition and prospects before gathering them into the orphanage, it fills one's heart with joy that he has been allowed a part in such Christlike ministry. On behalf of myself and the other members of our Orphanage Board, I wish again to thank the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and all others who have helped us to establish and continue the Compassion Orphanage as one of the agencies for extending the light of the glorious Gospel of Jesus Christ in this dark land."

The children mentioned in the foregoing letters are supported through the generosity of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. There are some 1,200 children in all, a number, however, being still without patrons to provide for their care and education. The missionaries plead for support in their behalf. Twenty dollars covers the training, clothing, food and sheltering of a China orphan boy or girl for a whole year. Any reader who is interested in this beautiful work can have an orphan assigned for support by communicating with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Contributions in aid of support, however small, will be welcomed.

The Robert Raikes Duplex System

TRADE MARK

For the Sunday School

This System, first offered to the Sunday Schools only a little over a year ago (under the name Beginners' Duplex), is now training tens of thousands of young people in the habit of making weekly offerings to Missions as well as to Local Support. Every day brings us letters such as this:

"We are much pleased with the results attained, and expect at the end of the School year to show a substantial increase in offerings. We feel that the largest benefit has come, however, from the educational value of the envelopes. At least twice a week (when the contributions are placed in the envelope, and when it is put on the plate) practically every pupil's thought is turned to others, and Missions is a constant presence."—L. S. Freeman, Roslindale, Mass.

We selected the name "Robert Raikes" for our Sunday School Duplex in remembrance of the founder of the modern Sunday School.

The Duplex System for the Church and the Robert Raikes Duplex for the Sunday School are both fully explained in "DUPLEX CHURCH AND SUNDAY SCHOOL METHODS." Write for it and for free ROBERT RAIKES UNIT No. 12. We shall be glad to send also particulars of the Graded Duplex System for the Sunday School, recommended by Rev. George H. Trull.

"Stanton, you ought to have a home of your own."

"I know it." Over Stanton's strong, noble face a natural glow of color passed. "Perhaps I shall have some time. Would it seem—well—strange to you if I were to say what you said just now is what Jesus said to me yesterday, as we were going over to look at the new city hospital? He said it just as naturally as you did just now."

"Why not?"

"That's what I said at the time. Why not?"

"Stanton, we're living in the midst of astonishing events, and no one can foresee the end. I anticipate some remarkable scenes at the university to-morrow. I wish I could go with you, but I shall be busy every minute getting ready for the conference."

"Will the ministers all come?"

"Yes, and from all I can judge now, I don't believe the church will begin to hold the people. Do you realize, Stanton, that the attention of the whole country is being directed to Raymond? The newspaper representatives of more than forty papers will be here to-night. You will, no doubt, have many of them out at the university to-morrow. But when you are through over here, let Jesus come to my house and rest before the conference while you meet your appointment with Dr. West."

"Come to your house and rest?"

"Yes. Have you not noticed he gets weary just as you and I do? Did you not see how tired he was after that tremendous outdoor service Sunday afternoon?"

"Yes. But why should he—"

"Grow tired? Have you forgotten him at Jacob's well? Is he not the same here?"

"'The same yesterday, to-day, and forever,'" murmured Stanton. "I'll do as you say and insist on his going to your house to rest. How strange! To insist on Jesus doing something! Maxwell, are we dreaming? Shall we awake soon to the old commonplace we used to know?"

"I think not. It is all too amazingly real. But I would give anything to go with you to-morrow. It will be a great meeting, that with the students and the chancellor."

"I'm sure of it," Stanton said. His excitement was rising. He vaguely imagined what might happen, but not even his glowing imagination could picture the reality as it occurred the next day out there at the university assembly, after that luncheon with the chancellor and several of the faculty members.

Those unparalleled scenes at the university had come and gone; he had returned to the city with Jesus and had seen him walking calmly toward Mr. Maxwell's house, while he himself, every nerve in him tingling with most thrilling feeling, walked over to Dr. West's to keep his appointment about the rooms where he anticipated making his future home with the doctor, who was Virginia's uncle, an old bachelor who had welcomed the possibility of having this strong young preacher in his house with him.

But not even when he went in and was greeted heartily by the doctor did he seem to be conscious of the object of his being there. And not even when Virginia appeared in the drawing-room did he seem to hear Dr. West saying:

"Virginia, Miss Page—my niece, you know—has just come over to see if her old uncle is behaving himself in his bachelor quarters. Nothing like having some one like Virginia to look after you, eh, Stanton?"

Not even the doctor's impersonal use of the embarrassing pronoun "you" nor Virginia's deep blush as she turned to say something to the doctor, seemed to attract Stanton.

"Yes," he said vaguely. "Excuse me, but I have just been through a most astonishing scene at the university. I cannot think of anything else just now."

"Oh!" exclaimed Virginia eagerly. "Tell us about it. He spoke there to the students."

"Yes," said Stanton slowly. "Yes."

He was silent. A full minute passed, one of those silences with which people were fast growing familiar.

A rush of sound swept into the house from the street. Dr. West was standing near the window and was looking out eagerly.

"Looks like the whole university."

Stanton rose, and Virginia, and side by side they looked out. A tumultuous crowd was flowing by, shouting, waving pennants and gesticulating. It seemed to the doctor and Virginia that the student body was divided into two hostile groups.

"They are headed for the church," Stanton said after a while.

"We ought to be going, uncle," said Virginia. "We won't be able to get in."

"Mr. Maxwell will find places for us. This conference is for the church people specially and was so announced. I want to hear from Mr. Stanton what occurred out at the university."

"It must have been—" Virginia began.

Stanton came back from the window and sat down.

"It was the most remarkable scene in a university I ever witnessed and confirms all my faith in Him. May I wait a moment?" He spoke to Virginia, who was leaning forward in an attitude of intense expectancy. "And I will tell as well as I can what occurred out there at the university." Virginia and Dr. West leaned forward with intense interest to listen as Stanton went on.

CHAPTER VI

"FIRST of all," Stanton began, "as soon as we reached the chancellor's we went right out to luncheon. Six of the professors were present. Do you know Chancellor Clark very well?"

He stopped abruptly to ask the question of Dr. West.

"No, not very."

"Neither do I. I went out there determined to carry an unbiased mind. Chancellor Clark is a smart man. A great lobbyist for the university and all that." But I had wondered why he wanted a person like Jesus to speak to the students."

"I soon found out. He was present Sunday morning when he spoke at the church, and from some things said there he judged that Jesus would deliver an interesting address to the students and add to the university's reputation. The chancellor, I am told, has always been eager to get celebrities to appear at the university."

Dr. West nodded.

"Mr. Maxwell had prepared me for the habits of the chancellor, so I was not surprised at seeing the liquor and tobacco at the luncheon. But I was surprised when Jesus appeared to take no notice of them in any way."

"Did he—"

"No. He did not touch them. But he said nothing. It is not possible to describe in detail his talk at the table. I have never heard anything like it anywhere. We have very few great talkers nowadays. He did not monopolize the conversation, but he led it out, and every man at the table did his best.

"But nothing unusual occurred, and the strange thing I could not avoid thinking about was that no one seemed particularly impressed with the tremendous fact that Jesus was actually the guest of the university. I believe the impression those men, including chancellor, received, was a clever, tinguished man of modest bearing, o was, perhaps, unusually well in-med, but in other respects not so y far superior to any one of them. 'When the luncheon was over and were in the auditorium facing the ident body, it seemed to me that nething unusual was about to occur. 'First of all, Jesus had requested of chancellor that he omit all words introduction. This was while we re seated at the table. When the ie came for the address the chancel- evidently intended to pay no atten-n to this request. He rose and be-n by a reference to 'our distin-ished guest' and was apparently go-g on with a long speech when it emed to me, and I think it must have en the same with the others, Jesus s addressing the students as if the ancellor were not present, and yet did not strike me as in any way rude discourteous. It all seemed so tural that no one seemed to be ques-ning Jesus' right to act just as he l.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

"For the next ten minutes I think it safe to say that every person in that eat audience was simply over-elmed by the eloquence of the aster.

"But do we not remember the in-ance of the attempt to arrest him ile he was speaking in the temple? nd do we not recall the astonishing ct that the Roman officers themselves red not touch him, and came back to ose who had sent them, giving as eir excuse, 'Never man spake like is man?'

"I do not believe the world has ever ven Jesus credit for overpowering quence as a public speaker. But I know that during those first ten inutes there was not a person of the irty-five hundred present who did t feel moved as he had never felt in his life by a public speaker.

"Suddenly he turned to the chancel-r and asked him a question concern-g the habits of a certain number of e students in the university. The ancellor was simply dumbfounded. at where I could distinctly see him, d I think I have never observed on y man's face such a look of anger d conviction combined.

"It was as still as death all over the eat hall. The voice of Jesus (have e not all spoken of its marvelous wer and beauty?) thrilled every one. nd I think what I felt, all felt—a real ar, such as no human being ever in-ired; at least I never had such a eling in the presence of any one as I d to-day, the feeling of a sinful an in the presence of perfect right-usness.

"Jesus' question was one he had a rfect right to ask. If the National ducation Association is right in say-g as it did two years ago that 'the eat end and aim of all education is aracter,' then surely Jesus has a ght to call the chancellor to account r his tremendous influence in the atter of his own example before his vn students."

"In the matter of the liquor and the bacco?" Virginia was saying eagerly.

"Yes. In the plainest language he lled the chancellor to account for ie personal example he was daily liv-g before his own students, an exam-le so contrary to that of a great ducator of youth that no excuse could e offered and the only reparation he uld make would be to repent and eanse his physical life of all such abits.

"Then came the scene which the pa-ers no doubt will emphasize the most. nd, by the way, there must have been ver twenty press representatives ere from over the country."

"Yes," Dr. West spoke. "Norman lls me the town will be full of them y to-morrow. This scene at the uni-ersity will bring many more."

"But this is only the beginning. As I was saying, the chancellor sat there while Jesus was condemning him, white with anger and conviction. Suddenly he stood up and exclaimed in a terrible voice:

"'Leave the platform!'

"I did not hear the word that followed. But after one tremendous moment of deathly stillness, the students all over the assembly hall raised a cry of remonstrance,

"'Fair play! Fair play! Let him finish!'

"Then followed what seemed to me the most remarkable scene of all the day.

"He turned to the student body and began to speak as if the chancellor were not present and had not said a word. I believe at that moment I had some glimpse of Jesus' real power as 'Lord of all.' As for the chancellor, I do not know yet what his action meant, but after Jesus began talking to the student body again, he turned and walked off the stage. The rest of the faculty members looked simply dazed at the whole affair, but they sat there on the platform, gazing at Jesus as if awestruck.

"As he went on talking to the students I realized that another scene was impending, this time with the students. For, as Jesus went on, he began to condemn the fraternities in the university, which were destroying the social democracy of the place. He seemed to know exactly what the conditions were, and looks of amazement were everywhere among the students as he went on to give detailed accounts of their social affairs, their wine suppers, and especially a recent carousal at the close of an athletic contest which had been a disgrace to the State.

"I shall never forget how groups of the students sat there white-faced and enraged as Jesus went on. And every minute I looked for some outburst, but the silence seemed to deepen as Jesus calmly, but with awful directness, spoke of the coarse dissipations and selfish exclusiveness of large student groups.

"Suddenly he turned to the faculty members on the platform, and to their bewilderment asked them what could be expected of students if those who were set over them as teachers and counselors were men of disbelief, men who taught distrust of the divine and superhuman, men who never taught their classes anything except technical facts, ignoring the entire subject of moral and religious experience?

"From the way he spoke I gathered that moral and religious conditions at the university have greatly changed since the Bible was put out of the State schools."

"They have!" Dr. West spoke emphatically.

"And Jesus again seemed to know exactly what professorships came under his just condemnation. Man after man on the platform sat there white-faced and enraged, but convicted in their own hearts of neglect to use their great office as teachers to teach the student body the main thing, which, as Jesus said again and again, is righteousness.

"Never in all the history of the university have faculty and students ever heard such an address at the assembly. I do not believe any words can express the power of Jesus' appeal as he closed. It was a heart-cry to the university to open the doors of the soul to God. Without in any way detracting from the value of the technical work the university is doing, he insisted upon the main thing in education, which is and always must be religious development, righteousness, social democracy, love to God and man.

"I walked off the platform with Jesus, leaving the audience, faculty and students still seated in the hall. One of the teachers who came out and overtook us on the way to Mr. Maxwell's said it was a full minute before any one stirred.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

"Then the spell seemed to be broken, and the assembly broke up in a storm of feeling. What we saw out in the road a few minutes ago was probably student groups taking sides for and against Jesus. I have no doubt members of the faculty and of the fraternities are calling him a 'boor' and a 'socialist' and an 'anarchist' and a vulgar 'sensationalist.' But no one can deny the fact that such an address, for sheer power and effect, was never heard at the university before."

"Do you feel that Jesus—ought— to have spoken as he did?"

Virginia asked it as if in her heart she was a little afraid.

"How should he speak?" Stanton answered in his deep voice, looking earnestly, as he spoke, at Virginia. "The usual talk at the Assembly, I am told, is some refined scholarly essay on some subject entirely removed from the great questions of conduct, of right and wrong, of pure and vulgar. What can we imagine Jesus talking about to students and teachers?"

"But—was he taking advantage of his invitation—to—to condemn the chancellor and the students and faculty? Will his action not make him enemies?"

"No doubt. We shall probably have some illustration of it before the day is over. But did not Jesus make enemies among some kinds of people the minute he began his ministry when he was here before? Is he not the same in all the ages?"

Virginia looked troubled. Then her face cleared, and she said, smiling calmly: "I am willing to trust him. He cannot do wrong. He must know best. But come, uncle, come, Mr. Stanton, it is half past two. If we do not go down to the church we cannot get in. I would not miss the meeting for the world. Let us start now."

"Maxwell will see to it that we get seats," said Dr. West. "But we had better go along. Looks as if there would be a crowd."

Accordingly they left the house at once. The moment they stepped out of doors they felt that an air of excitement pervaded the town. The streets were filled with people all hurrying towards the First Church.

As they joined the flow of walkers every now and then came to their ears the words which were destined to become oftenest spoken and heard all over the world—"Jesus is here!" uttered in tones of incredulity, amazement, passion, trust.

"Jesus is here!" Virginia murmured to herself in repetition of the words as they were repeated about her. She felt as if every day new vistas of life were being revealed to her, new visions of life's glory were about to become her joyful experience, and her heart was beginning to accept what life had to offer of new and mysterious unfolding—and ever and always at the center of all stood the regnant figure of Jesus.

"Jesus actually in Raymond! Living, talking, eating, sleeping, playing with the children, rebuking sin, encouraging righteousness, affirming the superhuman, declaring the fact of immortality, he himself in the flesh developing among them—"

She walked along by the side of Mr. Stanton, silent but happy, eagerly anticipating this conference of Jesus with his own disciples.

Long before they reached the church they began to realize what a crowd was gathering about it.

"'And the multitudes thronged him'," murmured Stanton. It was with real difficulty they managed to get up to Mr. Maxwell's study door, to which Stanton had a key. The entire street in front of the church was blocked by the students and townsfolk clamoring to get in.

Mr. Maxwell had come over from his house with Jesus and he was lying down on the couch in Maxwell's study. At Mr. Maxwell's request Stanton went out into the church room to see if all details of the seating of the congregation were being carried out. He came back into the study to report that the church was packed. All the ministers of all denominations were present, and representatives of the churches' membership. Many of the business men of Raymond had closed up their stores. Mr. Maxwell's Brotherhood had managed the ushering admirably. They had given admission to the ministers and church members first of all, as the conference was to deal especially with church problems. But an increasing and fast growing restless crowd of people including the noisy and excited students was outside, and as unreasonable mobs are in the habit of doing, demanding admission in spite of the fact that the church could not hold another person.

Maxwell came back from the couch where the figure of Jesus was lying, and said quietly to Stanton: "Go out in front and tell the crowd he will speak to the people outside after the conference. Ask them to be as quiet and patient as possible. Tell them this conference is called especially for the church and should be respected."

Stanton immediately went out through the church to the front of the building.

As he made his way through the aisles he noted first of all the absolute quiet and hush of the people. In spite of the enormous crowd that filled every available space, there was no whispering, no restless movement. It seemed to Stanton even in his brief passage through the room that a Spirit was brooding over the people, that even before he had appeared, the people in the church were preparing their hearts to receive him as their Master.

To be continued

"LO, I AM WITH YOU ALWAY"

I'M footsore oft, and weary,
For the way has been so long,
And the storms that beat around me
Have been so fierce and strong;
I've climbed up dreary mountains,
Whose paths were rough and steep;
I've waded through dark waters
That were so cold and deep.

But all the way so weary
One joy has been my own;
I've always known one comfort,
I have not walked alone!
For one has ever been near me,
Whose face I could not see,
But I cannot tell to any
All He has been to me!

When darkest clouds were o'er me,
His presence seemed more near;
When trials sore have pressed me,
I've felt His love most dear.

When, weak and worn, I stumbled,
His strength has held me up;
When fainting by the wayside,
He filled my empty cup.

When faith is weak and faltering,
He whispers words of cheer:
"Those whom I love may suffer,
But I will help them bear;
I know the path before thee,
I'll guide thee all the way;
Its end is joy unending,
Mid heaven's eternal day."

So I still travel onward,
Though dark the path and dim;
I would not miss one trial
That brings me nearer Him!
And when at last in heaven
I stand, by His dear grace,
Mine eyes shall see with rapture
His unveiled, beauteous face!

A WHOLE TOWN GOES TO CHURCH

ON a recent Sunday just 1,680 of the 1,700 men, women and children who constitute the population of the aristocratic little Cincinnati suburb of Wyoming attended divine worship. The twenty citizens missing included the village policemen who guarded the deserted homes, several sick folks and their nurses.

Thus it happened that on Wyoming's Pilgrim Sunday wealthy business men shared pews with their chauffeurs, while maid and mistress blended alto and soprano in hearty and harmonious concert. Between the hours of 10.30 and 12 A.M. no figure save that of the solitary guardian of the law paced the empty streets.

Wyoming — the whole town — had gone to church!

The Tuesday night previous, when the Wyoming Welfare Association, composed of 150 business men of the town, held its monthly meeting, the unique plan was first proposed. It originated with Attorney Edward Ritchie and was received with spontaneous enthusiasm. The idea was not to urge attendance at any special service, but to push a movement that would land every person in the community in one of the four churches on the following Sunday. No time was lost in forming the Wyoming, Ohio, Welfare Association. By Wednesday noon the entire village was placarded with bills a yard square, bearing the following inscription:

"Clean Up, Dress Up, and Go to Church.

"Every man, woman and child in this village is requested and expected to go to church this one day this year. The police alone are excepted. They will protect your property from those suspicious persons who are not at church that morning."

This was only the beginning. Mayor Jones issued a proclamation declaring that "because of the unmistakably helpful influence of the various churches on the community of Wyoming, now, therefore, be it resolved that every citizen of this town shall, with his family, attend church next Sunday morning, thus recording his recognition and appreciation of these common benefits." It was emphasized in the proclamation that the town church-going was not a denominational affair.

The town was divided into nine districts, each in charge of a member of the uplift committee, and a house to house canvass followed. Pledge cards were circulated, and before the end of the first day's campaign more than half of the population had signed. Skilled diplomats were assigned to secure signatures from busy housewives, whose Sunday dinner proved a most serious obstacle. These distressed wives and mothers pointed to the difficulties in the way, whereupon the committee lay in wait for the head of the family and from him secured promise of entire willingness to eat a cold dinner on the occasion if necessary.

A boarding-house keeper, who confessed with a deep sigh that she had not been able to go to church on Sunday morning for more than a year, shook her head mournfully. "She shall go to church this Sunday morning," said the boarders in unison. "What is more, we will escort her." And they did.

Results were beyond expectations. Rev. A. L. Wilson, of the Wyoming Presbyterian Church, reported 150 more present than had ever sat in his congregation; Canon Charles Reade, of the Wyoming Episcopal Church, was fain to borrow extra chairs. Standing room was at a premium when the Rev. Clarence Kemper of the Baptist Church began his sermon.

The example set by the little village of Wyoming will not stop there. Already ministers of other cities are talking of it. The success of the movement in Wyoming may prove the means of stimulating church-going in many other localities. R. T. NEELY.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

HERE is another very practical answer to prayer. Mrs. N. W. writes, from West Roxbury, Mass.: "I prayed earnestly for a customer for my farm, which was running me into debt, as I had no one to carry it on. And just when it seemed as if I could not carry it another month a customer came and bought it." Another friend testifies to the Father's interest and help in home concerns. Mrs. T. D. N., of Penacook, N. H., writes: "I cannot tell how many of my prayers have been answered, there have been so many. I am sixty-nine years of age next December, and since I was fifty I have earned a thousand-dollar home in which I am now living. I talked with God with a childlike trust, for I had no home. It had been lost. I asked him to give me work to do and strength to do it so that I might earn a home. I am now, and have been all these years, perfectly well. I am the child of a King."

Miss B. McG. writes from Madison, S. D.: "The Answered Prayer department always interests me, and I know from experience that God does hear and answer prayer. From a child I have always brought my cares to him, and I know hundreds of times I have felt my prayers directly answered in the small affairs of life as well as the greater ones." "I was in great trouble," writes H. A. R. from Grand Rapids, Mich., "and I promised God if he would help me, and I knew he would, that I would tell others what he did for me. He helped me, and made me happy again."

A "perfect day." That is a beautiful thing to have, is it not? G. A. E. writes from Plummers Landing, Ky. "I most earnestly desired a certain thing to come to pass, and, because I prayed for it, God sent me my 'perfect day.' I am so glad and happy to know God answers the orphan's prayers." Mrs. J. N. C. writes from North Adams, Mass.: "I am eighty-seven years old and have been for many years a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which I prize highly. I cannot get out to church, so I have the sermon and the other lessons for my Sabbath. I am a believer in answered prayers and have had many answered for me."

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

The Foreigner*

IT IS quite a striking thing that the week after our Thanksgiving lesson we should study the subject of The Foreigner. On Thanksgiving Day we looked back through three centuries and thanked God for our nation, its splendid history and vast prosperity. The subject of the foreigner makes us see the present life of the United States in a vivid flash, as we try to fancy what it means that these millions of strangers from other lands are coming to take their share of the duties, the opportunities and the rewards of this Western wonderland.

The stricter immigration laws sift out the multitudes who wish to come to our New World and now only those are admitted who are able-bodied, capable of self-support, of good moral character and free from contagious disease. The immigrant has contributed amazingly to American life in the past, and with these later restrictions he is surer than ever to be a gain rather than a loss to our civilization.

The part that the immigrant takes in American life has been graphically depicted by Frederic J. Haskins, who makes the immigrant say:

"I make nineteen-twentieths of the clothing. I manufacture more than half the shoes. I build four-fifths of all the furniture. I make half the collars, cuffs, and shirts. I turn out four-fifths of all the leather; I make half the gloves. I refine nearly nineteen-twentieths of the sugar. And yet I am the great American problem.

"When I pour out my blood on your altar of labor, and lay down my life as a sacrifice to your god of toil, men make no more comment than at the fall of a sparrow.

"But my brawn is woven into the warp and woof of your national being.

"My children shall be your children, and your land shall be my land because my sweat and my blood shall cement the foundations of the American of to-morrow."

One of the noblest utterances ever made about our alien friends is the poem by Robert Haven Schauffler, "Scum o' the Earth." It appears in full in Dr. Francis E. Clark's striking book, Old Homes of New Americans, in which he calls our attention to the truly noble ancestry of these people whom we are tempted to regard as beneath us. He speaks of the possible ancestry of the "young fellow from Socrates' land." He speaks of the gifts of Poland's sons to the world, and of the great men of Italy. Most beautiful is his picture of the Jew. He sees in the "sorrow-bowed head," "the features tender yet strong," "the eyes full of wisdom and mystery," perhaps the poet king, perhaps the prophet, perhaps—but let us quote his own beautiful words:

Man—lift that sorrow-bowed head.
Lo! 'tis the face of the Christ.

He exhorts us:

Countrymen, bend and invoke
Mercy for us blasphemers,
For that we spat on these marvelous folk,
Nations of darers and dreamers,
Scions of singers and seers,
Our peers, and more than our peers.

Our Scripture references bring out clearly the one needful thing which will help us to solve the problem of the foreigner. We owe him one first, clear duty—the duty of love. That was required even of the ancient Jews who were taught to believe that they were intrinsically superior to the people of other nations and were forbidden to associate with them. Yet the strangers who came to live among them they were commanded to love. "Love ye therefore the stranger; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." But now since the life, the message and the death of Jesus has made it clear that all men are truly brothers, we are under still heavier and more definite obligation to love the stranger. Paul declared to the Athenians that God "hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth."

In Dr. Schauffler's stanza about the Jew there lies the real secret of our duty. Not because our Jewish friend comes of the same race to which Jesus belonged, not because there may be in brow and eye and beard some resemblance of the Man of Galilee, but because of his own earnest words and deeds and sacrificial death, we are to see not only in the Jew, but in all our neighbors from far or near, the very Christ whose we are and whom we serve. Our opportunity to serve and help them is an opportunity to serve and help him, for he has said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

our nation is to continue to be in-ed God's country and to receive esh blessings like the blessings of e past the church must not relax her forts to evangelize and bring in to rist's kingdom our neighbors, na-ve and foreign, in this new land.

We owe a duty to the Indians. This as their land before it was ours. any things in the history of the alings of the white man with the d man should fill us with shame. he church has an opportunity of un-ing some of these earlier wrongs by elping them now. Noble work is be-g done in missions and in schools. ut there is constant need of new nds and new workers to win and old the Indian for Christ.

There are ten million negroes in the nited States. Much has been done r them. Much is being done, but uch remains to be done, and we must ot shirk the task. Particularly do e owe a duty to our new neighbors rriving by the millions from over eas. In this connection study the otes on these pages for the Ep-orth League and the Baptist Union. hen there are the sailors and the lum-ermen and all classes of laborers. here are our nation's politics to urify and its vices to purge. While ot slacking our interest in the for-ign field we should increase our fer-or in making this new, fair land the and of Christ.

Among the Immigrants*

DID you know that the Baptist denomination had 70,000 members in its foreign-speaking churches? Many more foreigners have entered the English-speaking churches. The German Baptists have a theological school at Rochester, N. Y. The Swedish Baptists, the Norwegian, the Danish, and the Italian all have separate theological schools. There is a training school for French students at Newton, Mass., and a training school for Hungarian students at Scranton, Pa.

One of the finest things about the foreign-speaking churches is that they send back missionaries to their mother countries and to their fellow countrymen who are sojourning in other lands. There are fifty-eight Italian Baptist churches in America. And one Baptist who returned to Italy established a Baptist church in his little home town of Bisaccia, which has grown to have a congregation of four hundred.

This encouraging picture of past achievements and present endeavors, instead of bringing a feeling of complacent satisfaction, acts as a spur to hurry us forward to still more loyal energetic service for Christ among these friends from other lands.

BOWERY MISSION'S 34th ANNIVERSARY

ENTHUSIASM and high purpose mark the big meetings of the Bowery Mission's thirty-fourth anniversary in progress from November 7 to November 16. As a good start the infant child of Business Manager Hunt was baptized and dedicated to the work the first night. Saturday evening several converts of the Mission stirred the audience as only such men can. Three splendid "Mother Bird" meetings enlisted many noted speakers, among them General Horatio C. King, Rev. George S. Avery, Rev. J. H. Dowkontt and Mr. John H. Wyburn. On November 10 a memorial tablet to Dr. Louis Klopsch was unveiled, commemorating his great services to this work. Dr. Sandison presided. Miss Mary Klopsch unveiled the tablet, and fitting addresses were made by Dr. Iglehart, Rev. A. H. Howland and others. The industries of the missions, always a live topic, occupied one evening, Dr. Mason W. Pressley, of John Wanamaker's, and Mr. W. J. Scandlin, blind president of the Blind Men's Club of New York, being the speakers. A rousing testimony meeting will complete the celebration at 8 P.M. Sunday, November 16. The activity and importance of this unique work have never been more convincingly put in evidence nor to more enthusiastic and determined audiences of friends and workers. Fuller details of the services will appear in a later issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Dewdrops Hold Back a Train

NOT infrequently this happens in the southwestern part of Minnesota and those parts of the Dakotas where the prairie grass grows most luxuriantly. In case the wind blows in a direction diagonal to the railway track, it turns the tall grasses either over the rail on the one side or on the other, or, possibly, if there is grass between the rails, over both of them. While those heavy tufts of grass are dry they may lie thickly over the rails; yet the engine cuts through them without any seeming exertion. But when the dew lies heavily upon the grass the many isolated stems begin to clot together. At the same time the dew renders the rails more slippery. Presently the local train starts puffing and grumbling. Its engine turns the wheels—but there is no progress. As badly as any train was ever stalled in a snowstorm it may be held up by the little dewdrops, until the sun appears and the dew graciously arises from the grass. The only way to prevent a delay of that kind is the removal of the tall summer grass along the entire railway track. Else the gentle dewdrop may cause one's failure to meet his appointment and impede the traffic along an entire line.

FAMILY OF FIVE

All Drank Coffee From Infancy.

It is a common thing in this country to see whole families growing up with nervous systems weakened by coffee drinking.

That is because many parents do not realize that coffee contains a drug—caffeine—which causes the trouble. (The same drug is found in tea.)

"There are five children in my family," writes an Iowa mother, "all of whom drank coffee from infancy up to two years ago.

"My husband and I had heart trouble and were advised to quit coffee. We did so and began to use Postum. We now are doing without medicine and are entirely relieved of heart trouble.

(Caffeine causes heart trouble when continually used as in coffee drinking.)

"Our eleven-year-old boy had a weak digestion from birth, and yet always craved and was given coffee. When we changed to Postum he liked it and we gave him all he wanted. He has been restored to health by Postum and still likes it."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for the little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be boiled.

Instant Postum is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and with cream and sugar makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There s a reason" for Postum.

THE NEW STANDARD DICTIONARY

THIS work is a revision of the Standard Dictionary first issued by Funk & Wagnalls in 1894. From its publication the Standard Dictionary has been the most practical and most helpful among all English dictionaries by reason of its new and original conception of what a dictionary may and should be and can and should do. Its aim was to give information of a practical, usable kind, and to make that information easily and instantly accessible to anybody. The New Standard Dictionary has all the virtues of the earlier edition and adds a number of new features which will make it a most valuable and usable storehouse of information and instruction.

It records and defines over 450,000 terms—at least 50,000 more than any other dictionary. The additional terms are those brought into use by the recent developments in science, invention, industries, commerce and exploration, by the recent changes in political relationships throughout the world, by the closer and quickened intercourse between nation and nation. Newspapers and magazines are constantly using these terms, and readers need to know their pronunciation and meaning.

Whatever one's trade or profession, one will find the terms used in that trade or profession all recorded, all pronounced, and all defined. More than that, by a system of collecting under each leading term all the related terms, a reader is put at once into possession of the vocabulary of each specific calling, or process of manufacture, or class of product, or sport or game.

The definitions are in character and in form more efficient definitions than can be found in any other dictionary. They are placed immediately after the spelling and pronunciation, so that a reader, having found a word, lights at once upon its meaning. Furthermore, the meanings are given in the order of their commonness. The usual or prevailing sense of the word is first defined, then its less common uses. The definitions tell by explicit statement what words mean, not by repetition of other words that may be even less definitive or clear in meaning.

In illustrative quotations and the distinctions of synonyms it is the largest and most complete of all dictionaries. Quotations are the freshest and aptest, taken from current magazines and newspapers as well as from books of standard literary character. With each quotation is given not only the author, but the specific place, by page, section, chapter, book, publisher, and date of publication.

In the distinction of synonyms the New Standard Dictionary is unequaled in the number of words distinguished and in the clearness and precision of the distinctions. Lists of antonyms are given, suggesting new lines of thought for comparison and illustration. Wherever occasion offers, explicit direction is given in the choice of correct and the avoidance of faulty diction. In all these features the New Standard Dictionary is an efficient schoolmaster, an authoritative instructor in the use of the English language. It aims to give exact information. With every biographical or historical fact the exact date, when known, is given. With geographical names it gives more descriptive and historical matter. It will be found to give in the aggregate more facts in history, geography, biography, etc., than any similar work. These facts are at once accessible by being entered in alphabetical place in the main vocabulary. Foreign phrases and statistics of population, which are subject to regular and frequent revision, form the only encyclopedic matter relegated to an Appendix.

Aside from its treatment of proper names of all kinds, it supplies a vast amount of encyclopedic matter in connection with the discussion and explanation of common terms. This matter referred to is not limited to information for the matter-of-fact man about merely physical things. The whole range of human knowledge is embraced. The scholar and student will find in it the definition, analysis, exposition, and illustration of the difficult abstract terms of their chosen sciences given with clearness, precision, and completeness. It gives not only descriptions of past theories and conditions, but also comprehensive though concise statements of present conditions, theories and movements. The terms used in sociological and economic science and in the systems of political and social reform all receive definition and exposition.

The illustrations number more than seven thousand. Their character and quality are seen, for example, in the full page pictures of butterflies, of modern steel construction, of flowers (wild and cultivated), of leaves, of Roentgen ray apparatus and photographs, of the solar spectrum, of wireless telegraphy, etc.; and in such unique features as the double-page Table of Geological History.

The general arrangement as well as the typography are admirable. The latter include choice of type, arrangement of the page, position of the keywords on each page, position on the page of the key to pronunciation; and the quality of paper, presswork, and binding. These things add much to the ease with which the book may be consulted, and to the durability of the volume under the stress of constant use, and all combine to make it the most valuable single English book that can be put on the reading table or the library shelf.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—"GIPSY" SIMON SMITH is making successful tours throughout Canada. At St. John, Sackville, New Glasgow and Halifax, the churches all proved to be too small to accommodate the large crowds which gathered to hear him. Before taking up the work of an evangelist Mr. Smith was employed for six years as a missionary by the London City Missionary Society.

—THE ACTIVITIES of Dr. J. H. House, whose work at the Thessalonica Agricultural and Industrial Institute, Salonica, Greece, is well known to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, have had to assume a rather different character since the close of the Balkan War. The school was founded to train boys of all nationalities in agriculture and the trades as well as in Christianity. Its new efforts are to care for and train as many as possible of the refugees who by one or another of the warring nations were driven from their Macedonian homes. Dr. House is now in America, but is hastening his return to Salonica. He says the funds of the school are barely sufficient to provide the boys with work. Many improvements might be made on the farm which the students have no time to attempt, and many refugees might be profitably employed to secure these improvements if the small daily wage could be provided which they would require. Their needs would be thus supplied, and at the same time they would have the advantage of learning scientific methods of farm work, and, when they returned home, they would carry to various lands the inspiration thus secured for better modes of life. The school is incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, and is supported by voluntary gifts administered by a board of directors of five different denominations.

—MRS. M. WALLACE of 1012 Chester Street, Bremerton, Wash., writes to ask for gifts of reading matter for the navy boys in Bremerton. She says: "There are battleships, barracks and a navy hospital, and books such as the Life of Moody or Livingstone or of a similar nature would be acceptable. Perhaps some of your readers might spare such a book from their libraries."

I should like to tell you what a fine paper I think you have. My Garden of Hearts

By Margaret E. Sangster

The announcement of a book by an author so widely known and greatly loved as Mrs. Sangster is an event in the literary world.

My Garden of Hearts contains over sixty complete stories and a number of charming sketches. In these tales the author has dealt in her own delightful way with the romance and sentiment of life in city and country, among the rich and the poor, the cultured and the simple, and through it all she has woven the golden thread of love, and lighted it with the sunshine of a cheerful and optimistic philosophy. Her Garden of Hearts is fragrant with kind deeds, with noble sacrifices, with tender sentiment and brave resolutions, and the people one meets there are such as we love to become acquainted with. The reader seems to move in an atmosphere of old-fashioned gardens, blossoming orchards, ripening hayfields and fragrant woodlands. All her stories, whether the action be indoors or in the open, are "near to nature," and her characters are for the most part men and women loyal and lovable, with a purpose in life that makes it worth while. They are capital stories, that will fill many a leisure hour with pleasure and profit.

100 Wonder Tales

By Dr. Francis Trevelyan Miller

Author of "American Hero Tales"

Here is a book with a thrill in it—a thrill of awe, of admiration, of wonderment, of patriotism.

How would you like to see the oceans rush together? To climb rays of light into the stars? To throw your voice across a continent? To walk on the bottom of the seas? To spend a few days in the bowels of the earth? To ride on the winds from country to country? These and other sensations are described in this book of marvels.

How Many of These Questions Can You Answer?

What is the name of the man who created the boat that ushered in the age of steam navigation?

Who is the American woman who discovered a comet and was given a medal by a king?

Who was the farmer's son who, inspired by a bird cage and a hearth brush, invented the cotton gin?

Who was the bankrupt storekeeper who worked in a debtor's prison, and plucked the secret of rubber-making from a rubbish-heap?

Who was the starving artist who gave up his pictures for science and invented the telegraph?

These questions, and scores of others equally fascinating, are answered in this interesting volume of Wonder Tales.

The volume is full of the stories of men who have created wonderful things—stories of women who have solved the secrets of earth—stories of boys who have struggled and become famous—stories of girls whose hands have made this world more beautiful.

Every word of them is true; yet they compose a volume of romance, history and biography that epitomizes the whole progress of American heroism, invention and genius.

We will send you, postpaid, 100 WONDER TALES, bound in cloth with illustrated cover; The Christian Herald Almanac for 1914 and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one full year—all three for only $2

How It Came To Be—What It Is

Not a "Cut and Dried" Work

Most musical collections are "cut and dried" in that they are bulky volumes of difficult music put together without regard to their suitability for use in the home. The method by which The Ideal Home Music Library was compiled stands out in sharp contrast.

How It Came To Be

The idea of The Ideal Home Music Library occurred to the compiler about twelve years ago, and over ten years were spent in studying the home music field and in gathering together the compositions which comprise its contents, the challenge for each number being the magic word "melody," and each one has met this severest of tests.

What "The Ideal Library" Is

The Ideal Home Music Library is exactly what its name implies, a perfect compilation of piano and of vocal music for use in the home. It comprises ten (10) convenient volumes of piano and of vocal music with a Practical Guide to its use, the entire set housed in a substantial case (illustrated on the left), which may be placed on the piano or on the music cabinet—a thing of beauty as well as usefulness.

Every Conceivable Kind of Music

Among the more than one thousand piano and vocal numbers, specially arranged for home use, contained in The Ideal Home Music Library will be found every conceivable kind of music—classic, modern, standard, operatic, sacred, sentimental, dance—in fact, every kind and class to appeal to every taste.

The "Practical Guide"

Here again is at once a remarkable and an absolutely exclusive feature. The Practical Guide leads you through the 3,000 pages of The Ideal Home Music Library just as a "Baedeker" conducts you through Europe, bringing out the strong points of each individual volume and rendering intelligent use of the music possible from the very start.

Its Sphere of Usefulness

The usefulness of The Ideal Home Music Library is absolutely without limit in every home where music is a factor in the recreational plan. Every member of the family from the lover of classic music to the five-year-old nursery rhyme singer will find his particular taste catered to by an abundance of just that kind of music he prefers, and he will further find that every number is readily performed.

A memorable epoch in the history of music was inaugurated through the recent publication by Charles Scribner's Sons of "The Ideal Home Music Library," and the immediate favor with which it has been received affords concrete evidence of timely issue Conceived more than twelve years ago, and gradually worked out as a labor of love, it fulfills far beyond the wildest expectations every enthusiast's dream of an ideal home musical compilation, and, most important of all, the formation of the Scribner Musical Club not only makes possible your purchase of the work at a substantial saving on the publishers' price, but you have the added advantage of paying for it in convenient monthly remittances.

THE BOWERY MISSION CELEBRATES

CROWNS ITS THIRTY-FOURTH ANNIVERSARY BY UNVEILING A MEMORIAL TO DR. KLOPSCH

THERE was a great gathering in the old Bowery Mission on Monday evening, November 10. It was the week of the celebration of its thirty-fourth anniversary, and the men of the Bowery assembled on that night to do special honor to the "man who saved the Bowery Mission," the late Dr. Louis Klopsch. That his name is very dear to those who came into personal contact with him during the many years of his connection with the Mission was evident throughout the whole proceedings. Seldom has such a crowd been gathered within the walls of the historic Mission Hall. Every seat was filled; even the aisles were occupied and the gallery was packed with interested spectators of both sexes. On the platform were the Mission officers, and a number of friends of the work, including Mrs. Louis Klopsch, Mrs. Stephen Merritt, Mrs. G. H. Crawford, Mrs. J. G. Hallimond and other ladies. Among the audience were Mr. E. R. Johnstone, Mr. Otto Koenig, president of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mr. Theodore Waters of the same journal, and a number of men and women active in philanthropic and church work. American flags decorated the platform, while a large panel in front of the organ loft and facing the auditorium was draped by a single silken flag, covering up a newly placed memorial tablet of pure white marble.

UNVEILING THE MEMORIAL TABLET TO DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH AT THE THIRTY-FOURTH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION OF THE BOWERY MISSION

At eight o'clock the meeting was opened by the superintendent, Dr. Hallimond, who invited the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to preside. Dr. Sandison, in taking the chair, told how Dr. Klopsch eighteen years ago in the spring of 1895 saved the Mission, which was then facing a crisis in its affairs and seemed about to come to a close. The appeal made to him to save the Mission was not in vain. "We will take it over," he said, "debts and all, from to-day; and with God's help and blessing, and the help of his people all over this country, we'll keep the Mission going as long as I live." How nobly and faithfully Dr. Klopsch redeemed his pledge the whole world knows.

The act of unveiling was very gracefully performed by Dr. Klopsch's only daughter, Miss Mary Klopsch, who, after the cheers had subsided which greeted the tablet, said: "I am very glad to have the honor of being chosen to unveil the tablet in memory of my dear father. As Whittier said: 'Grant to us memory, and we can lose nothing by death.' I think the best way to keep my father's memory green is to love humanity as he did."

Addresses were delivered by the Rev. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, D.D., the Rev. A. H. Howland, Mr. J. H. Wyburn, former superintendent of the Bowery Mission, and Mr. B. F. Butts. Mr. Butts also sang a Gospel solo and with such power that at half past ten the meeting took new lease of life, testimonies were called for, and after an invitation given by Senator Gledhill of Brooklyn, many men gave themselves up to God.

Fanny J. Crosby, the blind poetess, was unable this year to be present; but in her advanced age of ninety-four years she did not forget the Mission, in which she was one of the earliest workers. She sent a poetic message, which was read from the chair.

The following message from the President of the United States was read:

"THE WHITE HOUSE,
"WASHINGTON, Nov. 5.
"My Dear Mr. Hallimond:

"I learn with genuine interest that you are preparing to celebrate the thirty-fourth anniversary of the Bowery Mission, and take advantage of the occasion to express my sincere interest in the mission and my gratification, along with that of all thoughtful persons, that its success has been so constant and beneficent.

"Sincerely yours,
"WOODROW WILSON."

This was received with great enthusiasm.

A feature of pathetic interest at the opening service on November 7 was the public baptism and dedication of the infant son of the business manager of the Mission, Mr. J. T. Hunt. This child was also born on November 7, one year ago. A few months later the mother suddenly passed away. The act of the father in dedicating the child to the service of God was most impressive.

On Saturday evening, November 8, was held the anniversary of the Brotherhood; on Sunday morning, November 9, the Rev. George S. Avery of Chester Crest, Mount Vernon, preached the annual sermon. Bishop Burch of the New York diocese of the Protestant Episcopal Church delivered a short and hearty address. On the evening of the same day Mr. Thomas S. Davies, one of the converts of the Mission, made the principal address. He is a man of remarkable power and held the large crowd spellbound for nearly an hour. Twelve months ago he was rescued from a dissipated life and graduated from the Mission Labor Settlement with honor. Tuesday evening, November 11, was devoted to the industries of the Mission, with addresses by Dr. Mason W. Pressley and Mr. W. I. Scandlin, the blind president of the Blind Men's Club. On Wednesday evening, November 12, a great temperance meeting was held, in which Dr. George B. Richards gave the principal address. On Thursday evening, November 13, "Mother" Bird's night, the principal speakers were General Horatio C. King of Brooklyn, Miss Virginia C. Young, deaconess of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and Rev. George H. Dowkontt, M.D., Mrs. Dowkontt being the soloist. On Friday evening, November 14, a concert was given by Mr. J. H. McKinley of New York, and Saturday evening, November 15, was devoted to the Winner's Club of the Mission. On Sunday, November 16, meetings were held at which the superintendents of the principal missions in New York and vicinity took part. Large crowds were assembled at every meeting, the only regret being that on each occasion so many were unable to obtain admission.

The work of the Mission goes on with unabated success night after night. Many souls are being won for the kingdom every year, and the Bowery Mission is now widely recognized as one of the great moral forces of the day. Its spiritual and economic influence is felt over a wide area. Its Free Labor Bureau has grown to unexpected proportions and is a blessing to many thousands seeking employment, while its Industrial Annex has been the means of helping to self-support and good citizenship many who were apparently hopeless and friendless and literally "down and out." Its "Bread Line," which reaches to the lowest depths of want and suffering for its beneficiaries, opens on Thanksgiving Eve and continues until Easter.

A FAMOUS TURKEY PAGEANT

IF ANY one is intending to suggest some new special day for general observance, he should speak promptly. There are still but 365 days in the ordinary year, and they are being snapped up fast by one fad and another, good, bad and doubtful. Most of us would have said that the great American bird, the turkey, had it been consulted, would have said there was one day too many devoted to him already. But, somehow, the turkey-raisers in southwestern Texas seemed to feel there was one day too few. The prevalence of onion days, rice days, and the like, really inspired the movement for a Turkey Day. If the side dishes could be celebrated, why not the pièce de résistance? Then, too, the great interest shown by Northern visitors in the quite common sight thereabouts of large droves of turkeys wending their way along the roads to the market towns encouraged the Commercial Club of Cuero to undertake the celebration. Cuero, you must know, claims to be the center of the greatest turkey-producing section in the world.

Turkey-raising is so easy in the Cuero county, where the winters are mild and the turkeys can find green feed all the year, that it falls to the lot of the women and children chiefly. The old turkey hen, privileged to roam about the farm as she will, generally selects a well-protected place for her nest, and there she attends to the hatching of her brood. Then is when the only real work comes in, as it is necessary to keep the turkeylings cooped until they are about ten days old, and for about thirty days it is necessary to see that they are put to roost properly. After that they are allowed to run with the grown ones, and the only danger is a sudden heavy rainfall, when they must be driven to shelter, as a turkey has little sense. After the young birds are safely past the first thirty days, they are practically out of danger and very hardy.

For the unique celebration, besides many sports and other features, it was planned to round up a few of the ordinary droves of turkeys and have them driven down the streets in a great parade to the strains of a military band. Hotels, boarding-houses and restaurants were urged to prepare special dishes of baked turkey, roast turkey, turkey giblets, turkey hash, and other dishes in which the Thanksgiving bird should be a contributing portion. A big banquet was to be served in honor of the Texas governor and such other notables as might be induced to attend. So great did the interest become that the Associated Press prepared a feature story of the event and sent it broadcast over the country, and the first thing the Cuero Commercial Club knew, the report had it that Governor Colquitt and staff would lead a parade of ten thousand turkeys down the main streets. It was something more than the club had bargained for, but in view of the splendid publicity received, the club voted to make the report good and muster the 10,000 birds in the line of march. Did they do it? Twenty thousand visitors who jammed the streets of Cuero that day will tell you that they did. Over 14,000 turkeys marched down the streets behind the notables and the band in as good order as a drove of cattle or sheep. The big drove for the occasion came from Meyersville, 8,162 strong. It left Meyersville on the afternoon of the 24th, arrived at the camping-grounds half way late that evening and was put to roost in the surrounding trees. The birds arrived in Cuero early the next evening, the distance traveled being thirteen miles. That was a year ago. This year the carnival—locally known as a turkey trot—occupied four days, November 18 to 22, and the number of turkeys in line of march was reduced to about 7,500, as it was found that the sudden influx of so many birds overstocked the slaughter and packing houses. For, after all, it was not fun, but much as though the turkeys bravely said to the great sovereign public, "We who are about to die salute you!"

FOURTEEN THOUSAND TURKEYS ON PARADE IN CUERO, TEXAS

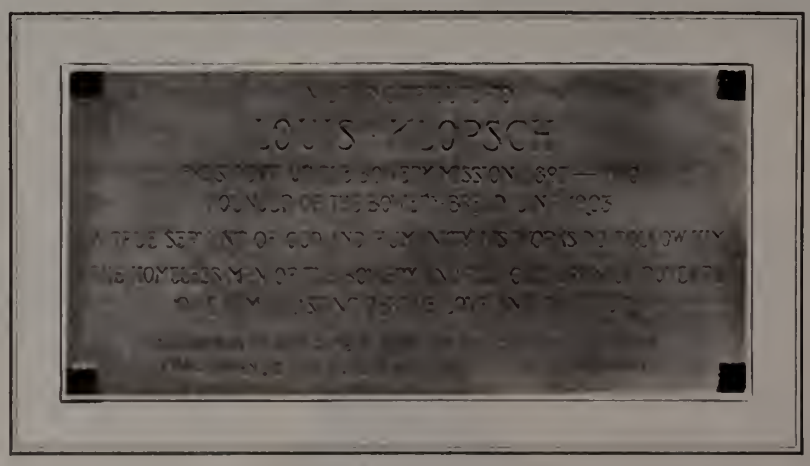
The thirty-four years of splendid service have made but a preparation for larger work to follow. The tablet to Dr. Klopsch, while it commemorates the mighty work he did, is an invitation to other leaders and other friends to carry on this great humanitarian service which is helping to brighten the world, and helping, also, to gladden heaven.



THE TABLET TO DR. KLOPSCH

Work of the Bowery Mission

CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have, for many years, borne the chief part of the financial burden of the Bowery Mission. Under the direction of Dr. Klopsch (whose memorial tablet, just dedicated, appears on this page), they assumed that responsibility at a very critical juncture in the history of the Mission. They have not only supported the institution by their money, but their sympathy and prayers have also been continuously and most generously bestowed.

It will be a matter of supreme satisfaction to them to know that with every succeeding year the success of this famous old place becomes more wonderful. The last great day alone will reveal the full extent of the beneficent results of the work. Tens of thousands of men have been lifted from the lowest depths of degradation and despair into the new life in Christ Jesus. Homes have been rebuilt, scattered families have been reunited, prodigal sons have been brought from the wilderness and the husks of an evil life and replaced in "the Father's House."

During the last six years over twenty thousand workless and dependent men have had positions found for them at living wages. In the Mission Industries and the Labor Settlement there are always to be found men who are engaged in temporary work until such permanent positions are found for them.

The unequivocal success of the work in every branch is well known throughout the world. Never did it stand higher in public estimation than at present. The truth of the prophetic words of Dr. Klopsch shortly before his lamented death is being strikingly realized. He said: "The work of the Bowery Mission will go on long after I am dead. It is a work that lies on the hearts of God's people—to help the helpless and lift up the unfortunate; to give the stranded and penniless prodigal another chance; to cheer and comfort the despairing, and to win back to home and friends and hope and self-respect those young lads who have taken the wrong path, and who are in danger of going down to utter moral, social and physical ruin, unless we reach out a kindly hand to succor them before it is too late. I verily believe that this work of the Bowery Mission has a broader ground of human appeal than any other I have ever known."

As the Thanksgiving and Christmas seasons approach, when the demands upon the funds and upon the energy of the workers of the Mission are greater than at any other time of the year, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD appeals with great confidence to its readers to supply the sinews of war.

By the time they have read these lines, the first of these festivities will be upon us. This will be followed, in a few short weeks or days, by the cold, bitter, savage weather of winter, in which men, ill-clad and homeless, will be brought face to face with the terrific experiences that come into such men's lives.

In many a family circle where this paper will be read, prayers will be offered and kindly thoughts will be sent to the workers and the men on the Bowery. We are sure that our readers will not forget that the best way to secure answers to their prayers is to see that the Mission is supplied with necessary funds.

Do not forget that dollar subscriptions and half-dollar subscriptions are just as gladly received and will carry just as much of the Master's blessing as larger contributions, and bear in mind the beautiful and unfailing promise: "Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again."

Checks and money orders should be made payable to the Bowery Mission and sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York City. All will be duly acknowledged.

THANKSGIVING HYMN

BY Althea C. Brodsky

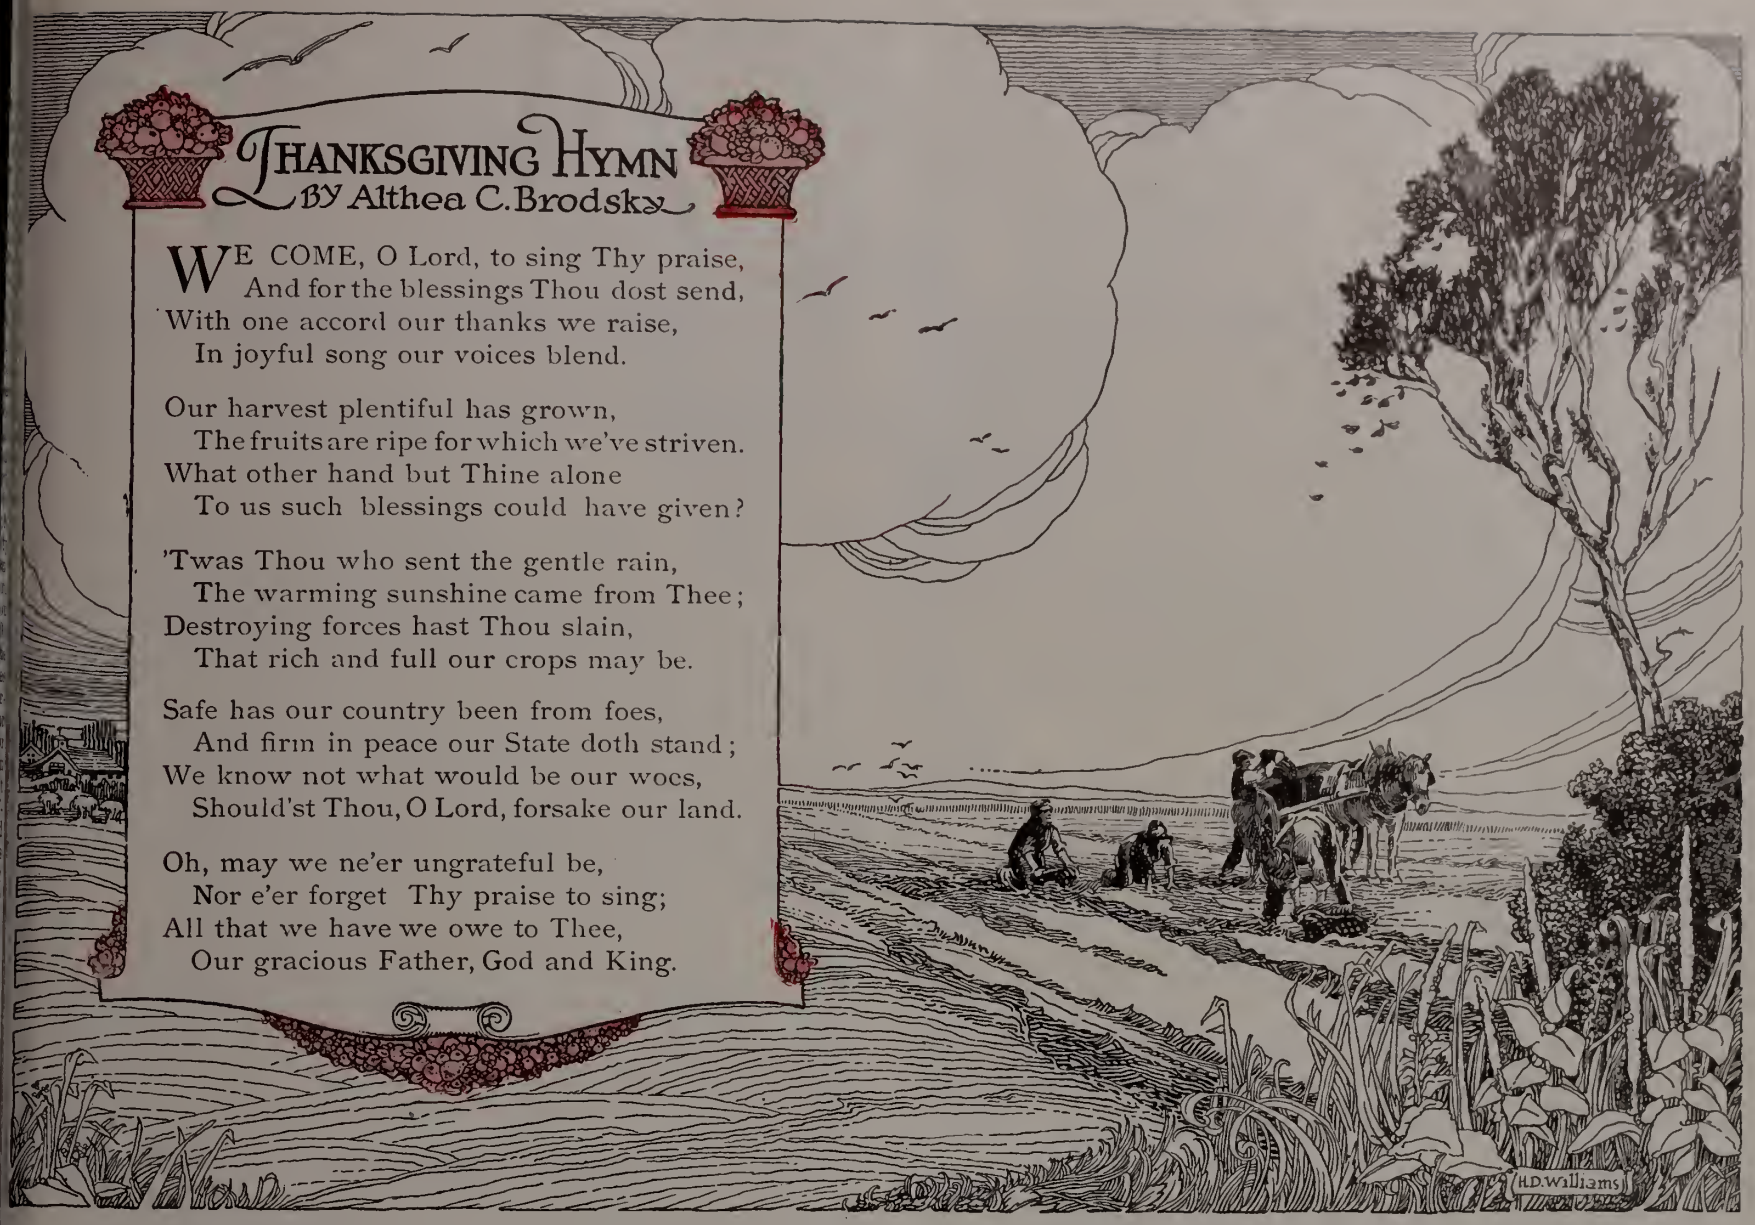
WE COME, O Lord, to sing Thy praise,
And for the blessings Thou dost send,
With one accord our thanks we raise,
In joyful song our voices blend.

Our harvest plentiful has grown,
The fruits are ripe for which we've striven.
What other hand but Thine alone
To us such blessings could have given?

'Twas Thou who sent the gentle rain,
The warming sunshine came from Thee;
Destroying forces hast Thou slain,
That rich and full our crops may be.

Safe has our country been from foes,
And firm in peace our State doth stand;
We know not what would be our woes,
Should'st Thou, O Lord, forsake our land.

Oh, may we ne'er ungrateful be,
Nor e'er forget Thy praise to sing;
All that we have we owe to Thee,
Our gracious Father, God and King.



A NOTED SCIENTIST PASSES AWAY

ON NOVEMBER 7 Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace died in his ninety-first year. It is scarcely twelve months since the noted scientist startled the reading world by a violent denunciation of modern civilization in his Social Environment. His fame, however, rests securely upon far different contributions to the problems of the day.

The outstanding fact in the life of this great scientist is his recognition of plan and purpose in the universe, and of a final destiny of the soul. This conclusion is the more significant because of Dr. Wallace's earlier convictions to the contrary. It was not spiritualism that wrought the change, but the amazing discoveries of his scientific research. Science to him, as he grew old, bore indisputable testimony to the existence of an almighty and all-wise Creator.

Dr. Wallace was of Scotch ancestry. He began his work as a naturalist in early life. Facts were his great objective, and disliking the duties assigned to him in a surveyor's office, he sought and obtained a place on a scientific expedition to the Amazon with the entymologist Henry Walter Bates, with whom he traveled for four years. The first of his prolific writings, Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro, sprang from that experience.

It was on his next foreign expedition, to the Malay Islands, that he made the discovery that was to rank him with that group of "giants," Darwin and Huxley and Spencer. The same expedition gave him the material for his literary masterpiece, The Malay Archipelago. Dr. Wallace here arrived at the same theory respecting the origin and life history of species as that already formulated but not published by Darwin, and he advanced his opinions in correspondence with Lyell and other scientists. The utmost satisfaction which Dr. Wallace ever claimed for his "discovery" was that it compelled Darwin to write and publish his famous Origin of Species.

To this great subject and other branches of science, particularly upon animal distribution, Dr. Wallace made many invaluable contributions. Not content with having a leading part in revolutionizing thought in such departments of knowledge, he entered the field of spiritualism. Here Darwin and Huxley could not accompany him. Dr. Wallace, formerly an agnostic, became a firm believer in the survival of the human personality after death, and, of course, in the existence of spirits. His creed may be found in his declaration: "Everywhere I turn I find a purpose in creation. I cannot examine the smallest or the commonest living thing without finding my reason uplifted and amazed by the miracle, by the beauty, the power and the wisdom of its creation." A striking testimony of science to the fundamental truths of religion. He gave to spiritualism the same uncompromising support which characterized all his work, and became the associate of such scientists as Sir Oliver Lodge, Sir William Crookes and others.

THE LATE ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE

Dr. Wallace was an original thinker, and his positive views fearlessly expressed often drew much adverse criticism upon him, but with no other result than to intensify his utterances. When his acceptance and defense of spiritualism aroused a storm of abuse—Wallace had always been more or less agnostic—he retorted by reminding the scientific world of its famous errors in the past—laughing at Benjamin Franklin's lightning-rod, Sir Humphrey Davy's gas schemes, Stephenson's locomotive, the theories of Galileo, Harvey and others.

Socially, Dr. Wallace was content to pass for what he was, a man of independent thought—little concerned about the dictates of fashion. He is said to have dressed with care as regards neatness, but in matters of style and fit without thought. His shoes were large and heavy, and his appearance awkward, excepting for the air of assurance that characterized him. The duty in early life that disgusted him was the collecting of money from farmers for services rendered by his older brother as surveyor. His spirit leaped to be about big things, and once free from the limitations of office work, he devoted his life to matters in which he could direct his own course and follow his bent.

Dr. Wallace produced many books and on divers subjects. His contributions to the subject of the origin and preservation of species rank with Darwin's. He wrote upon every subject that enlisted his serious attention, and whatever he had to say was read with care.

Dr. Wallace was a leader in the growing land nationalization movement in England, a pronounced advocate of woman suffrage and an out-and-out socialist. In every controversy aroused by his advanced thinking Dr. Wallace was able to stand by his convictions with eminent skill.

Alfred Russel Wallace was the last survivor of the band of scientific "giants" already named, and a noted member of that younger group who now carry the honors of the English scientific world.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, November 30. Exodus 33: 12-23. "Show me thy glory." Moses wist not what he asked. His speech was beyond his knowledge. The answer to his request would have consumed him. He asked for the blazing noon when as yet he could only bear the quiet shining of the dawn. The good Lord lets in the light as our eyes are able to bear it. The revelation is tempered to our growth. The pilgrim could bear a brightness in Beulah Land that he could not have borne at the wicket-gate: and the brilliance of the entry into the Celestial City throws the splendors of Beulah into the shade. Yes, the gracious Lord will unveil his glory as our "senses are exercised to receive it."

"My presence shall go with thee." That is all the glory we need upon the immediate road. His companionship means everything. The real glory is to possess God: let him show us his inheritance as it shall please him. Life's glory is to "feel him near." When the loving wife feels that the husband is in the house, and when the loving husband feels that the wife is in the house, that is everything! The joy of each other's presence is the crown of married bliss. And so it is with the soul that is married to the Lord: His presence is the soul's delight. "Thou, O Christ, art all I want." "O Master, let me walk with thee."

MONDAY, December 1. Joshua 6: 8-20. Here is a big thing conquered by a big faith. It is material versus spiritual, and the spiritual prevailed. Once again the breath was mightier than earthquake and fire. It is so difficult for us to realize the essential weakness of material might. I saw two volumes standing side by side. One was a record of the Napoleonic wars; the other was the Gospel of John. In which dwells the greater power? Not far from Armstrong's great gun-works, in Newcastle-on-Tyne, there was in my day a little Methodist chapel. In which of these dwells the secret of ultimate victory? In the huge factory, or in the little church? Which is the mightier thing, an army or Charles Wesley's hymns?

We must revise our estimates of life's values. Let us not allow mere mass to terrify us. External measurements tell us little. God's breath can annihilate Assyrian hosts, and those in whom his spirit dwells are "mighty to the pulling-down of strongholds." "Our hope is in the Lord our God!" The proud citadel falls when the Lord is leader of the siege.

TUESDAY, December 2. Joshua 5: 9-15. We never march alone in holy crusades. There is always with us on the road a man "with his sword drawn in his hand," the "Captain of the host of the Lord." No consecrated army is bereft of his presence, and he is our hidden manna, the secret of unfailing vigor, the spring of abiding inspiration. He never deserts from the field, either in the exhausting day of waiting, or in the uncertain day of the fight. "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

In all our reckonings we must count upon him. In all our estimates of battle against the evil one we must assume the certainty of his presence. There is no trembling about his promises; we are not dealing with fickle whim and caprice. It is all firmly and solidly sure. When his soldiers are on the field, then with unalterable certainty the Captain is there with them. Whence, then, cometh our fear?

> God is with us! God is with us!
> So our brave forefathers sang.

And he is with us! He is with every soldier, marching in ranks, or doing sentry duty alone, with every soldier, in every noble battle, until the last campaign is won.

WEDNESDAY, December 3. Joshua 2: 1-14. Rahab lied in the defense of the two spies. Was the falsehood justified? Is kindness permitted to practice deception? Can a lie be made winsome when told in the interests of another? How was it with the lowly Nazarene? Did he ever employ a compromising shade in order to save the world? Nay, in him was no darkness at all; there was no shadow cast by turning. And when we bring a lie, even a lie inspired by kindness, into his holy presence, it stands condemned. God can achieve his holy purposes without our lies, and his plans never include the ministry of deceit.

The courage of truth is a sublime virtue. To have faith in the truth is high spiritual achievement. To believe that God will care for the structure, if our stones are well and truly laid, is to pay acceptable homage to his holy name. All crookedness, in the light of the Lord Jesus, is alien to the divine purpose and will. "Walk in the light even as he is in the light." "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all."

THURSDAY, December 4. Joshua 2: 15-24. That scarlet thread in the window! How suggestive it is of profound experience in the life of man! The scarlet thread would ensure protection from the attacking host. The red blood upon the lintels ensured the passing by of the destroying angel as he went through the Egyptian homes. And there is a scarlet thread in the window of every believer in the Lord Christ, and the avenger of guilt passes by! We have life through his death; "the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin."

The scarlet thread in the window! "He shall give his angels charge over thee," and thou shalt have protection, and comfort, and peace. And the scarlet thread can be in the window of the cottage as well as of the mansion, in the window of the turreted castle as well as of some lowly cotter's hut in desolate wilds. We may all share the blessed protection. "He died for all." In him we shall never die! We shall pass into a short sleep, but we shall never pass into the darkness of forsakenness. Yes, we shall sleep, and open our eyes to find ourselves with "the blood-besprinkled band" who stand by the crystal sea.

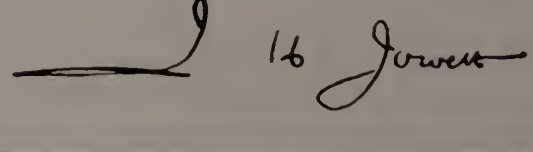
FRIDAY, December 5. Hebrews 11: 30-40. The greatest wonders are not in nature but in grace. A regenerated soul is a greater marvel than the marvel of the springtime. A transfigured face is a deeper mystery than a sun-lit garden. To rear graces in a life once scorched and blasted by sin is more wonderful than to grow flowers on a cinder-heap. If we want to see the realm of surpassing wonders we must look into a soul that has been born again, and is now in vital union with the living Christ. Even the angels watch the sight with ever-deepening awe and praise.

As the spiritual is the home of wonders, so also is it the field of brightest exploits. It is not what men have done by the sword that counts in the esteem of heaven; such deeds mean little or nothing—it is what they have done "by faith." Weak, frail men and women have put their faith in God, and have done the impossible! Faith unites the weakling with almightiness. Faith makes a lonely soul one with "the spirits of just men made perfect," and with that he shares "the power and the glory" of the eternal God.

SATURDAY, December 6. Exodus 15: 11-18. When we invent little devices to protect us against the evil one he laughs at our petty presumption. It is like unto a child erecting sand ramparts against an incoming sea. The only thing that makes the devil fear is the presence of God. Our money can do nothing. Our culture can do nothing. Our social status can do nothing. Only God can deal with devils. "By the greatness of thine arm they shall be still as a stone." When thou art with me "I will fear no evil"; the fear shall be with my foes.

It is therefore the divine in anything which endows it with a strong defense. If the holy God dwells in our culture, then our culture becomes like an invulnerable fort. If God abides in our recreations, then our very sports are armed against our foes. If "the joy of the Lord" is in our festivity, then our very merriment is proof against the invasion of the world. When the Lord is in us fear dwells in the opposite camp. "Therefore will not we fear though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be shaken in the heart of the seas."

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913



THE SPIRITUAL POWERHOUSE

ONE evening a stranger came into a large city, and wishing to see the places of historic and civic interest, he walked around looking at the large buildings and public fountains and monuments erected in memory of some local heroes and benefactors. Finally he paused in front of a large brick building with many windows. Wondering what kind of an institution it might be he stopped a man who was going by. "Is it a school?" he asked. "No," was the reply. "A prison?" "No." "A factory?" "No." Several more guesses included a library, almshouse and hospital, much to the amusement of the passerby. Finally he volunteered the information that the building was a powerhouse. Then he added: "But, stranger, this building lights the school which you see over there; it runs all the machinery of yonder mill; it supplies all the power for our trolley cars, and the museum, library, almshouse and hospital are dependent upon it for their success and convenience."

The passerby went on his way, but the sightseeing stranger fell to musing. He was a preacher and had trained his mind to think along certain lines. Everything that he ever read, or heard, or saw, he carefully thought over, trying to find a lesson, a moral, an illustration with which to adorn Sunday's message. He had learned that the highways and hedges cried aloud, teaching about God. Every bush to him was a burning bush; every river a Jordan; every mountain a holy mountain.

"So it is with my church," thought the preacher. "It is the spiritual powerhouse of my community. Without it the institutions of society would find it difficult to exist, and difficult to accomplish their intended ends. My church, in order to do good, must furnish the light, must bring the bright spots into men's lives, must furnish the power to lift burdens, must lift the hearts and minds of the multitudes to high ideals and ideas of service. Its message must be the message that will inspire my people to noble deeds, born of a vision. It must be a message that will make the vision of God's kingdom clear, and inspire the seers to attach the vision to the task and do mighty works for God. The message of my church must teach a Christianity that will express itself in a practical way—and express itself in schools and libraries, almshouses and hospitals. My church, the powerhouse, must furnish the power that will do things as the mountain stream furnishes the power to turn the wheel of the mill, as electricity accomplishes things, as steam controls the machinery of a factory. So the power of God can lift—even the power of God in Christ, whereof he says, 'And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me.'"

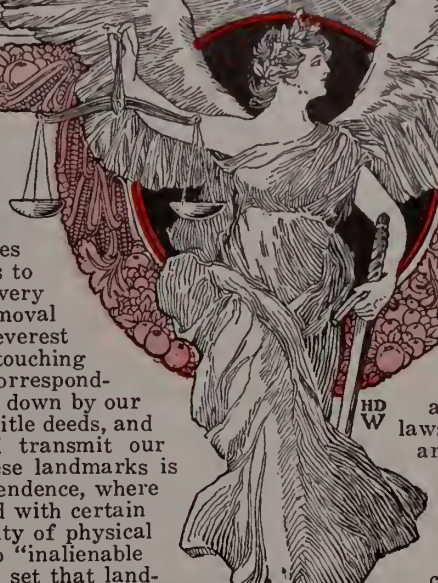
OUR NATION'S LANDMARKS

A Sermon for Thanksgiving Day

By Rev. David J. Burrell, D.D.



AT THE conquest of Palestine there were approximately fifteen millions of acres of land to be distributed among the children of Israel. This would allow twenty acres to each family, with a reserve of about two million acres for the public domain. The land thus distributed was to be held in perpetuity. It was duly surveyed and every parcel was clearly designated by landmarks. The removal of these landmarks was prohibited under the severest penalties, being regarded as a kind of lèse majesté, touching the foundations of the national life. We may find a correspondence to these landmarks in the political principles laid down by our American forefathers. These are of more value than title deeds, and must needs be scrupulously observed if we would transmit our sacred heritage to succeeding ages. The first of these landmarks is set forth in the preamble of the Declaration of Independence, where it is affirmed that all men are born free and equal and with certain inalienable rights. The reference is not to any equality of physical or mental endowment, but to an equal standing as to "inalienable rights" before the law. Thanks to the wise men who set that landmark for us! Ours is the only one of the great nations that has it. We acknowledge no "divine right of kings." We confer no titles of nobility. We recognize no aristocracy save that of brains and industry and personal merit. All men, without distinction of birth or color, are free to climb the ladder of preferment clear to the top. This is as our fathers planned it.

But there are some ominous signs. We are advised that in some of our courts of justice a rich litigant has the advantage of a poor man; that on election days and in our legislative halls a white man has the advantage of a black man; and that in industrial circles a man with a certain badge is permitted to say his neighbor without that badge must not be permitted to earn his living by honest toil. All these are flagrant violations of the American doctrine of equal rights, which Robert Burns expressed so well in the familiar words:

> What though on homely fare we dine,
> Wear hoddin gray an' a' that?
> Gie fools their silk an' knaves their wine;
> A man's a man for a' that!

The second of our national landmarks is the Constitution, in which the framework of our government is outlined and wise provision made for the securing of the "inalienable rights" referred to.

At the time when our Constitution was in process of construction the French Revolution was in progress. The aim of the revolutionists was to establish a pure democracy, that is, a government by direct vote. The cry was "Down with the throne! Down with the aristocracy! Down with the church! Down with all institutions, and up with the people!" The result was mob rule in its most violent and vicious forms. It was while the French Assembly was in session at Versailles, during the awful days of "The Terror," that our Constitution was framed. In the convention were such men as Washington, Hamilton, Franklin, and Jefferson. "There were giants in those days!" They saw the dangers of a pure democracy and proceeded to organize a republic, in which the people were to rule not directly but representatively. The ill-framed government of the French went down presently in fire and blood, while ours has survived the storms of all the intervening years.

As to Personal Freedom

There is a tendency in some quarters to remove the safeguards which were thus erected by our fathers by subjecting courts and legislatures to the immediate control of the populace. This would be to overturn the Constitution by transforming the republic into a democracy, and would place the people, acting with calm deliberation through their representatives, at the mercy of the people acting as an irresponsible mob.

The third of our ancient landmarks is the ballot:

> A weapon that comes down as still
> As snowflakes fall upon the sod,
> And executes a freeman's will
> As lightning does the will of God.

The ballot is the normal expression of the republican or representative principle as applied to equal rights. The doctrine of "universal suffrage" does not mean one man, one vote, nor one woman, one vote; it means simply that every man and woman must be represented in the government and that the ballot must be placed within the reach of all who are entitled to it. This being so, it is obvious that the elective franchise might be greatly restricted without the slightest violation of the equal rights of all.

I, for one, believe that our suffrage should be hedged in by moral, educational and property qualifications. For one thing, this would solve the problem of immigration which now so seriously confronts us. We can afford to welcome the flood of ignorant and penniless foreigners who are pouring in upon us at Ellis Island, if only they are not too soon equipped with the sovereign powers of citizenship. The danger lies there, and the remedy is in sight, if only our legislators had the wisdom and courage to apply it.

The Balearians are said to be the most famous climbers in the world, and they are made so by their mothers, who place the children's food in the branches of the trees and make them climb for it. Our ballot is worth climbing for, and the doctrine of universal suffrage is fully satisfied so long as the franchise is kept, however high, within the reach of all.

The fourth landmark of our government is law, which is the safeguard of our social life. For society has rights which every individual is bound to respect. A certain class of foreigners, who have not yet imbibed the American spirit, are fond of insisting on "personal freedom." There is no such thing as personal freedom in a republic like ours. The man who first settled on Manhattan Island was personally free. He could go naked, shout himself hoarse or throw stones at his own sweet will. But when another man came the freedom of the original settler was halted by a sign "No trespass." And every newcomer meant a further abridgment of his personal freedom until it was wholly absorbed in social freedom. That is, he was no longer free beyond the point where the exercise of his freedom would endanger society or impinge upon the rights of any other man. The attention of those who protest against our excise laws, our anti-gambling laws and our Sabbath laws, as a violation of individual freedom, is called to the fact that we are minding our own business as Americans when we place the welfare of society generally above the personal profit or pleasure of any man or any particular class of men.

The fifth of our great landmarks was formulated by President Monroe in his annual message of 1823. It was due to an evident disposition on the part of Spain to regain her lost colonial possessions on this continent. "We owe it," said the President, "to the amicable relations existing between the United States and the Great Powers of Europe to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our national peace and safety." This means, and it was intended to mean, that, without any desire to extend our national domain or interfere in the domestic affairs of our weaker neighbors, we assume a beneficent protectorate over them as against all foreign conquest or invasion. This is a large contract; but, in my opinion, it has been our country's best contribution to the cause of universal peace.

Religion and Loyalty

There are those who, fearing that the Monroe Doctrine may lead us into perplexing and unnecessary complications, would like to have it erased from the program of our national policies; but the time has not yet come, certainly not while a neighboring republic is fighting her way to freedom and self-government. The nations of the Old World still dream of conquest and expansion of territory; it is for us to say, as we are in a position to say: "Send your armies where you will, but not here! We stand for the rights of all America! Hands off!" And by virtue of this manifesto we occupy a coign of vantage, from which we may effectively urge the arbitral settlement of all international disputes and thus hasten the triumph of the Prince of Peace.

The sixth of our landmarks is the voluntary principle in religion. This is incorporated in the First Amendment to the Constitution, which provides that we shall never have "an establishment of religion"; that is, a state church.

This does not mean that ours is not a Christian nation. Our history, our institutions, our laws and jurisprudence are permeated by the spirit of Christ. But all our people are left free to worship God in their own way.

The union of church and state has been the bane of every country that has ever fostered it. One of Ireland's orators has characterized it as "that foul and adulterous connection which pollutes the purity of heaven with the abomination of earth and hangs the tattered rags of political piety on the insulted cross of a crucified Redeemer"; and the words were not too strong. All that any church can ask, in this or any other country, is a fair field and no favor. By that token our republic has thus far preserved its Christian traditions; and, in the further propagation of the Gospel from sea to sea, we ask no subsidies and crave no weapon but the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God.

It remains to mention one more of the landmarks which is set forth in our country's flag as an emblem of loyalty. It appeals to our patriotism, as citizens of the best country the sun ever shone on. Edwin Arnold said, "America holds the future in her hand." It is for us to see not only that the old landmarks are preserved but that for the future this Christian republic shall be a center of influence for the evangelization of the nations that still lie in darkness and the shadow of death.

The Chief Mission

As a Christian country we have a mission to perform which is as divinely marked out as that of the ancient Jews. On them was laid the responsibility of keeping alive the Messianic hope and transmitting it along the ages. With this end in view they were sent to a secluded country and ordered to go in and possess it. But they were to possess only so much as they should "set the soles of their feet upon." The land was especially adapted to the preservation of their sacred trust. It was separated by mountains on the north, an impassable desert on the south, the high cliffs of Jordan on the east, and on the west by the great sea. But while thus defended from the encroachments of surrounding nations, it was also in a position to influence the world. It lay at the crossing of the caravan routes between Greece, Egypt and Assyria, the three civilizations of the time. Here, then, was a coign of vantage for world-wide power. We find a singular parallel in the situation of our own country, which is impregnably defended by its sea-walls, and yet open to the commerce of the world. We are thus in a position, as a Christian nation, to meet our responsibilities and work out for ourselves the destiny God has ordained for us.

As we gather round our tables on Thanksgiving Day, let us gratefully recognize the goodness of him who "hath made and preserved us a nation," and, with a renewal of patriotic ardor, let us lift the song:

> Our fathers' God, to thee,
> Author of Liberty,
> To thee we sing:
> Long may our land be bright
> With Freedom's holy light!
> Protect us by thy might,
> Great God, our King!

NEARING THE END IN MEXICO

WHILE it is possible that the Mexican problem may reach a solution at any time, up to the second week in November General Huerta still continued to exercise the functions of a dictator, apparently unmoved by all the efforts that had been made to induce his retirement. Even ex-President Diaz, who, since he laid down his office, has studiously avoided intermeddling in Mexican politics, sent advice to Huerta through two influential friends urging him to renounce all feelings of personal prestige or power and to retire in the interest of patriotism and "save Mexico from a calamity." But the grim dictator, impervious to advice, holds on to his office, apparently defiant of the whole outside world and especially of the United States.

On November 10 our State Department in Washington received through Chargé d'Affaires O'Shaughnessy in Mexico City an official note from Huerta, in which the latter announced his determination to retain the presidency pending another election. He regarded this course as a "sacred duty." Only the present government, he declared, could call new elections and guarantee them. Such a call had already been issued. He explained that he had been compelled, for the salvation of the republic, to dissolve the Congress, as its continuance would have led to anarchy. There having been no election, and in the absence of Congress, he is compelled to remain at the head of affairs. The note, a copy of which was handed to the various diplomatic representatives, does not discuss the attitude of the United States. It is signed by Queredo Moheno, minister of foreign affairs.

Meanwhile the policy of our government in dealing with Mexico has been made sufficiently clear to the European governments, and France, Germany and Great Britain have signified their purpose of taking no step which would antagonize or discourage the effort we are making to vindicate the principle of lawful government in the Southern republic. The British premier, Mr. Asquith, has publicly declared that England has never entertained a desire to thwart the United States in carrying out its plans with regard to Mexico. The London Times of November 11, in "an authoritative statement," explains the motives of President Wilson to be such as can be recognized as valid by the British people, viz.: the vindication of the principles of representative and constitutional government, and the hope that revolutionary initiative in the Central and South American republics will be checked and that adventurers who succeed in grasping power may not count upon recognition, as the United States will only recognize as the duly qualified head of a republic a man who has the support of a majority of his enfranchised fellow citizens.

The Times continues: "Idealistic and unpractical though his principle may be deemed in some parts of Europe, it is one on which the people of the United States are e nestly agreed. Should it not be feasible to secure its application Mexico otherwise than by force of arms, force will inevitably employed, and when the United States army will have vindica the principle, Mexico will be left to govern itself in accordance w constitutional precepts which it will be the duty of the army inculcate." It adds that while President Wilson and his fellow c zens do not contemplate lightheartedly the application of milita pressure, it is an alternative from which they will not shri should the necessity arise. Such is the English understanding of the sit tion, the assumption being that it represents the substance of an enlighteni statement from the American ambassador in London. But other measures dealing with Huerta are now being talked of in Washington, which may away with the necessity of considering intervention. Our government h made inquiries among the great money-lending nations, with a view to "sta ing out" the Huerta régime by shutting off its financial resources. This p icy, it is claimed in certain quarters, would quickly produce the desired effe It is said to be Secretary Bryan's plan, who is understood to oppose the lifti of the embargo and the supply of arms to the Constitutionalists.

On November 14, the news from Mexico City was full of significance. M John Lind conveyed to President Huerta a final request that the latter car out his suggestion of not convening the newly-elected Congress, and he reported to have added: "I will not set my foot in Mexico City again until th Congress is dissolved." Huerta was given until six o'clock P.M. to make definite answer. At that hour, no reply having been received, Mr. Lind pr pared to leave the capital. All of his personal baggage was removed from h hotel to the American consulate. He still waited, but at seven o'clock no wo had come from Huerta. This attitude Mr. Lind accepted as a tacit refusal comply with our demand, and he le on the eight o'clock train for Ve Cruz. There was, however, still hope that at the last moment, poss bly by midnight, the dictator migh yield. The convening of the Mex can Congress has been one of th vital points in the recent negoti tions, as it was believed to b Huerta's purpose to take legislativ action on the oil concessions and als because the assembling of Congres would strengthen the dictator's clai of legality.

Rumors were current in Washing ton of the impending official with drawal of Mr. Lind and Charg d'Affaires O'Shaughnessy, but ad ministration officials were silent o the subject. Talk was renewed of a naval blockade of Mexico's ports, an of the collection of the customs rev enues. While any hour may brin forth new developments in the situa tion, there is still a strong hope fel in Washington that the problem wil be solved without extreme measures

UNITED STATES CRUISER "CHESTER" SAILING FOR VERA CRUZ

"JESUS IS HERE!"

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

The Author of "In His Steps," Etc., Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

A group of friends are gathered in the library of Rev. Henry Maxwell, pastor of First Church, Raymond, on the anniversary of the day when they had taken the pledge to make "What Would Jesus Do?" the test of their daily lives. In the group are Virginia Page and Richard Stanton, Mr. Maxwell's new assistant. They are all commenting upon a marvelous light which has been appearing in the sky, when Martha, Mrs. Maxwell's maid, enters the room with the exclamation: "Jesus is here!" She declares that he came to the service of the Rectangle Church, a mission founded by First Church, and had gone home with Mr. Grey, the pastor. At a remarkable service held a few days later in Mr. Maxwell's church Jesus addresses the people. Jasper Carter, editor and proprietor of the Evening Gazette, is intent upon a sensational story, and sends his best reporter, Barnes, and a "cub," Logan, to get the facts and photographs. Both men expose plates, but can get no results. Jesus calls upon Jasper Carter, talks with him for an hour, and leaves him a manuscript to read. A conference between Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Grey is interrupted by a telephone message from Rachel Page, Virginia's sister-in-law, announcing that her daughter is very ill. Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Grey reach the Page home just in time to learn that the little girl has died. Jesus is sent for and is present at the burial service, but does not bring the child back to life. Rachel Page finds her faith strengthened rather than weakened and insists that Jesus has comforted her and made her sure that her child is living in a better land. Carter asks Mr. Maxwell to his office and requests him either to secure a photograph of Jesus or find an explanation of the fact that it is impossible to take his picture. Carter is greatly angered by Mr. Maxwell's refusal. Carter summons Barnes, who refuses to make another attempt to get the photograph. He expresses faith in Jesus and criticizes the policy of the Gazette. They agree to separate, but Carter gives Barnes a month to reconsider. Jesus visits the State university, lunches with the chancellor and addresses a gathering of students, at which he scathingly rebukes, first the chancellor and some members of the faculty for their indulgence in questionable customs and their unbelief, then the students for their vices and selfish exclusiveness. A great crowd is gathering at First Church, where Jesus is to address a conference of Christians. Virginia and Stanton have been strongly and strangely attracted to each other.

CHAPTER VI—Continued

ONE of the ushers helped Stanton push a front door open and he managed to get out and face the mob. The people had poured up against the building, packing themselves in a living wall against the doors and sides of the church.

Stanton's tall figure and deep but penetrating voice commanded attention, and his announcement of Jesus' appearance after the conference partly satisfied the crowd.

As he turned to go back into the church, Stanton noted different groups of men who seemed to be eagerly disputing, and he had a vague feeling of future trouble from these men, but could not have told what it might possibly be.

For, the moment he was back in the church and had gone down by the platform, he was entirely caught up in the wondrous experience of being in the same room with Jesus, actually listening to his matchless voice, fascinated with his personality, captured, soul and mind, by his look.

The seats on the pulpit platform had been arranged by Maxwell so that Stanton should have one of them, but he invited up some visiting pastors from a nearby town, and just before Jesus came out he went down himself to a seat in a pew next to the front row.

He did not notice until he was seated that Virginia was next to him. As he turned his face toward hers, Virginia smiled faintly, then a shy look of pleasure passed like a faintest gleam through her eyes; and then to each of them it seemed as if the very presence of Jesus as he came out into the church brought with it a new definition of life in all its deep mystery and endless beauty and power.

What was the impression of that first great church conference held by Jesus?

Long weeks after it was history, Stanton, reviewing it with Virginia, would come back to a few great facts.

First, there was the continued deep silence of the people, broken only now and then by an eager question.

After that the pervasive calm of that Figure up there on the platform, so amazingly calm, so different from the splendid rage he had shown out at the university. It was a stupendous calm, unmatched for depth and confidence by anything they had ever seen.

Then there was that thrill of power and love for the church which every minister present felt with the first word spoken. What! The church was a power in the world? Yea, verily, the greatest of all. The gates of Hades shall not prevail against it? Nay, the power of death shall be of no avail. The church is the institution he loved. It shall abide forever.

Through all the conference ran this deep pulsing note of exultant victory.

Stanton caught himself more than once wondering when the Figure up there would begin to denounce, to criticize, to call attention to the weakness and faults of ministers and people.

What! No faultfinding? No criticism? No sharp exhortation?

The words of Martha on that memorable night occurred to Stanton and to Maxwell as the hour swiftly went by: "He comforted us."

Surely, the church needed that. Needed to be shown its greatness and its goodness. And he, the Master, the Christ, the Head of the church, was up there smiling, glad, triumphant, revealing to that gathering of tired, discouraged, bewildered, and even self-satisfied pastors and people the grandeur of their call and the might of their heritage.

All this and much more passed into heart and mind. And at the close, in the deepening silence, while all hearts beat fast, what an appeal for union of life and labor on the part of all the different names of the church people! Always that appeal to the ministers and churches to come together somehow in his name. Would he not tell what was the first step? Ay: love one another. That would prepare heart and mind for all other steps. But in

Ritual Murder Not Proven

THE notorious trial at Kiev, Russia, ended November 10 with the verdict, "Beilis not guilty, but the murder was committed in the Zaiteff works." In other words, though unable to fasten this specific crime upon the prisoner, the fact of a ritual murder having been committed by Jews is implied. The whole course of this famous case points to a deliberate attempt to make political capital out of a murder committed March 25, 1911, by arousing the anti-Semitic fanaticism of the Russian people. The Jew, Beilis, was arrested for the crime two months after the discovery of the slain Russian boy, Yushinsky. The police acted under higher orders, having evidence against a notorious woman but none against Beilis. Two years elapsed before the case was ready for public exploitation. On October 8 the trial began, and has focused the attention of the world on Kiev. That attention and the attitude of Christian people everywhere, reflected by more than one indignation meeting, undoubtedly had excellent effect upon the official prosecutors.

MENDEL BEILIS: ACQUITTED

The outcome of the long and remarkable trial comes as a great relief to Christian nations. The Russian Government had stubbornly refused to receive any representations upon the subject, and keen apprehension of a different verdict has been widely felt. The chief of the Kiev detective bureau produced proofs of the innocence of Beilis early in the trial and was arrested on the charge of manufacturing his evidence. Acquitted at his first trial, he was taken before a higher court, tried a second time and sentenced to a year's imprisonment. The spirit of race hatred waited only the signal of Beilis's conviction to enter upon new acts of outrage and murder against the Jews. Thwarted by the just decision of the court, the leaders of the anti-Semitic factions already pretend to see the influence of Jewish wealth in the verdict, and stern measures will be necessary to repress fanatical uprisings. Quickly following up the completion of the trial, a resolution was introduced in the Duma looking to the conferring on all Russian subjects of equal rights before the law. It is hardly to be expected that this celebrated case is ended, for the ambiguity of the verdict and the state of the public mind point to further developments.

The Death of a Famous Missionary

WHILE traveling in Mexico the Rev. Edmund A. Neville, one of the most widely known missionaries in the world, died on November 2 at Saltillo, the capital of the State of Coahuila. Mr. Neville had circled the globe many times in the interests of the Episcopal Missionary Board. It is probable that no missionary was ever subjected to a more startling experience than that of Mr. Neville in 1892, when, as a member of a party of six English missionaries, he saw his five companions eaten by cannibals and was himself held captive for fifteen months on a small island off the coast of New Guinea. The incident attracted worldwide attention at the time, and until Mr. Neville was rescued warships of many nations touched at port towns in New Guinea and sought information regarding the party. He finally managed to attract the attention of a party of sailors from a Dutch gunboat which passed the shore of the island upon which he was detained and he was returned to the United States.

After the experience in New Guinea Mr. Neville went to Oxford and completed his studies, and for several years devoted himself to missionary work in China, Japan, Singapore and Central America. A vocabulary of nearly two thousand words, which he gathered in New Guinea while among the cannibals, has been of great service to religious workers who have since worked among the natives.

Higher Wages for Railroad Men

THE pay-rolls of forty-one Eastern railroads are increased to the total extent of $6,000,000 by the compromise award of the Board of Arbitration, announced November 11. This is one-third the amount contended for, and substantially standardizes the rates in the East. The men claimed that Western standards should prevail in the East, where wages have been lower than in both the West and South, but a compromise was reached by practically standardizing the rate for Eastern and Southern territories. One hundred thousand men are affected and will receive back pay averaging $5 monthly from October 1. The award appears to be agreeable to the men, but railroad officials insist the public must expect to pay higher freight and passenger rates in consequence of the decision and the necessity the roads are under to install new safety devices, steel cars and other improved facilities. This board was appointed under the Newland law rushed through Congress early in the fall to prevent a strike.

Dr. Stuck Tells Alaska's Troubles

THE Rev. Hudson Stuck, Episcopal Archdeacon of Alaska, who last summer distinguished himself by reaching the summit of Mount McKinley, was presented a few days ago with a motor boat, by the members of St. Thomas's Church, New York. Dr. Stuck was in New York as deputy from Alaska to the General Convention when word reached him that a boat, which he had obtained after many delays and at great expense, had been lost with all on board. The craft was carrying coal from the mouth of the Yukon up through Bering Straits to Point Hope, where there is a mission station, and where it is necessary to import fuel, as the region is entirely devoid of timber. Dr. Stuck said in one of his addresses that the greatest difficulties of the missionaries in Alaska, and especially among the Indians of Yukon Valley, were not the cold weather, the loneliness or the ignorance of the people, but the unprincipled white settlers, who do all sorts of mean things to the Indians, from selling them bad whisky to stealing their goods outright. "It is pitiful to be compelled to teach savage people not to despise the whites," observed the archdeacon, "when most that they see are such reprehensible specimens."

The First Winter Storm

THE heavy snowfall and high winds, at times amounting to a blizzard, which visited different sections of the country November 9 to 11, left death and destruction in their wake. Cleveland, Ohio, was for a time cut off from outside communication, the storm there being declared the worst in the city's history. Many deaths resulted, business was badly affected and households were unable to obtain food supplies for days. On the Lakes untold suffering was caused by a three days' gale; vessels were torn from their moorings and sunk, and the crews of many perished. The shores of the Lakes were strewn with wreckage, and many dead bodies have been washed up for days. Pittsburg and all western Pennsylvania were badly crippled. The storm's devastation was felt as far south as West Virginia, and incoming steamers also experienced terrific weather. As a forerunner of winter, nothing could be less welcome than this calamitous storm.

Thirteenth White House Bride

THE wedding of the President's second daughter, Miss Jessie Woodrow Wilson, and Mr. Francis Bowes Sayre at the White House November 25 has been a topic of anticipatory interest for months. Early in November the House of Representatives purchased a combined platinum and diamond necklace and pendant as its gift, while the Senate's gift is a very handsome silver service. The pendant is pear-shaped and contains eighty-five small blue-white diamonds around one large brilliant canary diamond. A celebrated maker of wedding cakes at the same time began the creation of a 135-pound cake, over two and a half feet high and nearly two feet across. This is to be distributed in two thousand white boxes, the most coveted dream-magic of the year. Miss Wilson is the thirteenth White House bride.

To Lessen Perils at Sea

ON NOVEMBER 12 delegates representing twelve nations assembled in London as the International Conference on Safety at Sea. The deliberations of this important body were opened with a message from King George. Lord Mersey was chosen chairman. The aims of the conference are simple but far-reaching and of world-wide concern. Lord Mersey warned the delegates against expecting by resolutions to perfect the methods that must prevail in handling ocean traffic, observing that the chief aim is to reduce sea risks to a minimum, and safety is to be the goal rather than economy. The public can be expected cheerfully to pay all reasonable costs incurred in the true interests of safe travel by sea. The following countries were represented: Great Britain, the United States, Belgium, France, The Netherlands, Russia, Denmark, Germany, Norway, Spain, Canada and New Zealand.

Chattanooga Power Dam

AT CHATTANOOGA, TENN., on November 13, the greatest power project in the South was declared complete and put into operation. This is a nine-million-dollar lock, dam and power plant at Hale's Bar, eleven miles south of the city on the Tennessee River. With the dam in operation, Chattanooga and the surrounding district will be supplied with 65,000 electric horse-power each day, sufficient to operate twenty-five cotton mills or to run all the trains on the Chattanooga and Nashville Railroad.

In connection with the erection of the power plant, the Federal Government spent several millions of dollars in improving the river for navigation purposes. The dam is built on the gravity principle of cyclopean concrete, is 1,200 feet long, with an average height of 52 feet. At the western extremity is the lock for steamboat navigation, the highest single lift of any lock in the Western Hemisphere. At the formal opening of the power plant the Chamber of Commerce, the Chattanooga Manufacturers' Association, Retail Merchants' Association, the Wholesale Jobbers' Association and similar civic organizations were represented.

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

Thanksgiving

"THE year has brought us satisfaction of work well done and fresh visions of our duty which will make the work of the future better still." So speaks President Wilson in his Thanksgiving proclamation.

It is very likely that the Thanksgiving spirit will be somewhat changed in the years just ahead. The flavors and fragrances of the mince pies, the pumpkin pies, the cranberry sauce, the celery and the all-important turkey will lose nothing of their old-time charms and glories. The laughter will be as merry; the reunions as gladsome. But you must have noticed a new note of seriousness and responsibility in the expressions of American life. Alongside of much that is frivolous, much that is undesirable, there has been steadily developed a new insistence upon honor and justice and a truer neighborliness.

It has always been difficult to keep Thanksgiving from degenerating into a rather selfish festival. We have tried to keep the patriotic and spiritual notes prominent, but there has always been the tendency to be thankful chiefly for our own prosperity, our own protection, our own home happiness.

There is a steadily increasing number of American homes which find it difficult to be thoroughly cheerful while they are aware that so many other homes are sad and needy. It seems almost a ghastly thing to feast with extravagant superabundance in gratitude to God for giving us prosperity, when within the radius of a half-mile families may be in deadly want.

Nor is it charity alone that is needed. Charity is good, but justice is better. At least it is more fundamental. What the leaders of American thought and American life are striving for is a new condition of affairs in which there shall not be so many homes which must have a Thanksgiving dinner bestowed by charity if they have it at all. The charity dinner is the right thing to give now. You owe it to your needy neighbor, and have no right to enjoy your own feast unless you give it. But while you are giving it put your mind and heart at work to right the wrongs which make him destitute.

Not only among ourselves, but with other nations, are we insisting upon juster and kinder things. In the light of the present trying situation with a sister republic the words of the President's proclamation have a striking significance:

> The nation has been prosperous not only but has proved its capacity to take calm counsel amidst the rapid movement of affairs and deal with its own life in a spirit of candor, righteousness, and comity. We have seen the practical completion of a great work at the Isthmus of Panama which not only exemplifies the nation's abundant resources to accomplish what it will and the distinguished skill and capacity of its public servants, but also promises the beginning of a new age, of new contacts, new neighborhoods, new sympathies, new bonds, and new achievements of co-operation and peace. "Righteousness exalteth a nation" and "peace on earth, good will towards men" furnish the only foundations upon which can be built the lasting achievements of the human spirit.

"Keep the feast." Bring all the children and the grandchildren back to the old home. Attend the morning service at church. Sing and give thanks. Enjoy the bounties of the dining-room. But with your own home joys plan to bring cheer to homes that now are joyless. And with "the satisfactions of work well done" keep fresh the "visions of our duty which will make the work of the future better still."

Huerta's Last Defiance

HUERTA is proving more troublesome in Mexico than ever did Castro, the fiery little dictator who kept Venezuela and a considerable part of the outside world in more or less hot water several years ago. Huerta's rejection of our friendly overtures for bringing back peace and prosperity and a sound and sane republican form of government to Mexico, while not unexpected, adds to the difficulty of the problem. But there is a higher law, above and beyond those written in the statute books of a nation, which imposes an obligation to help to "set the house in order" which is torn by lawlessness and confusion to the peril and annoyance of its neighbors. This is the situation in the Southern republic to-day. Meanwhile our administration, which, as Ambassador Page has evidently made clear to England, is seeking to "vindicate the principles of representative and constitutional government and check revolutionary initiative in the Southern republics," is finding the path of political idealism by no means strewn with roses. The Times of London probably voices the prevalent outside view of our policy when it terms it "idealistic and unpracticable"; yet it recognizes that President Wilson has struck a new chord in international affairs which is not to be lightly valued. We have already made it clear that we are seeking no conquest in Mexico, and that we do not even seek intervention, but are solicitous only of advancing the high principle among the republics on this continent that they should be republics of free men, protected in the enjoyment of their political rights. This is the spirit which it is hoped may yet dominate the entire group of Western republics, and under the influence of which they can draw closer together in mutual interest; it is the broader vision of international righteousness and justice toward which all human progress moves.

Secretary Bryan's latest plan, to "starve out" Huerta by shutting off his financial supplies, may prove practical or the reverse. At all events it is probably more humane than the plan of supplying the insurgents with arms which might afterwards be turned against ourselves. Indeed, it is doubtful whether there is any wisdom in dealing with a revolutionary party that has conducted guerilla warfare incessantly for seven months and still is apparently far from successful. It is said that Huerta has grimly suggested an appeal by Mexico to The Hague. He could, however, have little hope from that quarter; besides, the tedium of such a proceeding would simply prolong the situation needlessly. The civilized world has already pronounced judgment on his usurpation, and its judgment cannot now be reversed. For the good of Mexico and the welfare of its people, the usurper must go.

Workingmen's Rights

ONE constitutional amendment adopted by the people of the State of New York at the last election makes possible and, by implication, imperative the enactment of a compulsory workmen's compensation law.

This country is still far behind European countries in this species of legislation. No greater injustice is being done to-day than that which shields the employer of labor from the consequences to his employees of the occupational accidents incident to his business. The workman who is incapacitated by accident has no legal place on the payroll; and to obtain redress of any kind must, at his own charges, prove in court that the accident was due to causes for which the employer was wholly or in part responsible: by no means as easy a thing to do as some may suppose who have not looked into t history of some such cases.

Obviously, the right-minded employer does n take refuge in subterfuge and evasion and worse escape from the situation. But, unfortunatel even the right-minded employer often rests und no legal liability to indemnify his employee, and prone to refer these cases to his lawyer rather tha to his conscience. Business is business, etc. Ne York now has a free hand to set a high standard this highly important matter, and Governor Glyn has declared it to be his purpose to do all in h power to bring about the right kind of legislation.

Beilis Acquitted

AFTER a tedious trial, the peasant jury at Kiev rendered its verdict acquitting Mendel Beilis, the Jew who was accused of the "ritual murder" of the Russian boy, Andriev Yushinsky. But there is a sting in the verdict which, while declaring Beilis innocent of the crime, asserts that a "ritual murder" was actually committed. Throughout the trial there never was a particle of real evidence pointing to Beilis's guilt, and the efforts of the prosecution toward the close seemed to be directed with the view of establishing a religious motive for the crime, rather than of fixing the guilt upon an individual perpetrator. This could have been for no other purpose than to excite the Russian populace against the Jews and reawaken the old race hatred.

It is probably too much to expect that the result of the Beilis trial will put an end to the "ritual murder" superstition, which has been so long and so disastrously brought up against the Jewish subjects of the Czar. It has been used as a red flag to excite the ignorant populace to fanatical outbursts against the unfortunate Hebrews, and it is responsible for more than one bloody "pogrom." Russia is the last of the nations to retain the ancient hatred of the chosen people—a feeling which is utterly at variance with the advance of modern ideas and with the usage in civilized communities. The Jew, whether in Russia or anywhere else, needs no apologist. He has made for himself a name and a place among all the nations, wherever he has been treated as a fellow man and an equal. Nor should it be forgotten that the ancient blessing which was given to the founder of the Jewish race, and which is recorded in Gen. 12, was coupled with a warning which has received frequent illustration in the history of nations. Those nations that have blessed Israel have themselves enjoyed resultant blessings, while those that have oppressed and persecuted the Jews have experienced retributive visitations.

Indianapolis Car Strike Ended

THE strike of the employees of the Indianapolis Traction and Terminal Company was settled on November 7. It had resulted in riots for a week, in which four had been killed and hundreds injured. Governor Ralston called out the National Guard and suddenly marched two thousand troops in the dead of night into the city. Their presence did much to cause a settlement of the strike. The employees won their demand for arbitration, but nothing was said about the recognition of the union in the terms of settlement. All the strikers were reinstated, except those who had engaged in violence in the riot; but the latter were given the right of appeal to the Public Utilities Commission for a hearing. The militiamen were sent home at once. Disputes and grievances as to wages, hours, conditions and service will be referred to the Utilities Commission for arbitration if the companies and employees fail to reach an agreement within a reasonable time. The Utilities Commission, by the terms of settlement, must render a decision which shall be binding on all parties for three years. The men had a right to strike if they had a grievance; but the riot and bloodshed were a crime which Governor Ralston promptly suppressed with his arm of military power. It was the wise thing to resort to arbitration. Such conflicts between capital and labor, not unnatural under modern industrial conditions, are fortunately growing less in magnitude, and there is the hope that as capital and labor are mutually interested in each other's welfare, there will continue to be an approach to the standard of our Lord, who said:

All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them. (Matt. 7: 12.)

Old Church Torn Down

THE old Bedford Street Methodist Church of New York City was in the way of the extension of Seventh Avenue, and the city condemned it. On November 16, the one hundred and eighth anniversary of the church was celebrated, and at the same time exercises appropriate to the last service in the church were held with a sermon by Rev. George W. Downs, the pastor. Far down in the musty old cellar of the church reposed the bodies—or what remained of them—of nearly three thousand of its congregation and community; but the finger of time had spoiled the coffin plates and other means of identification, the most recent interments having taken place nearly sixty-five years ago. This location is known as "Greenwich Village." A little over a hundred years ago, a class was formed and meetings were held at the home of Samuel Wolgrove on Morton Street, west of Bleecker. As the audiences grew, he took them into his carpenter shop, and in 1810 the original church was built on the present site, which then was surrounded by two huge willows and a cluster of magnificent poplars. There were evolutions in building from time to time, and now the landmark has been removed and the congregation has been officially united with that of the Metropolitan Temple. The tramp of the city herd marches over churches and through graveyards, paying no attention to their sacredness. The "cities of the dead," most of them, have to give way to the houses and the industry of the living. The downtown church problem is one of the most perplexing which the modern church has to solve. Old Bedford Street Church building is destroyed, but not the true men and women who founded it and maintained it. The flaming messages of God's ministers, the earnest prayers of his children, the copious tears of penitence, the exultant songs of rejoicing, the regenerated hearts of the believers and the glorious visions of the future life, during these hundred years, went into the best thought and affection of the city and became a most permanent part of its historic record. The material church may be torn down, but the spirit of true religion inhabiting it, and its effect upon individual character and municipal life, are indestructible. Amidst the mutations of time, the tearing down of material places of worship, the frailty of human life, God's kingdom continues with increasing force.

Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations. (Ps. 145: 13.)

STRIKERS AWAITING NEWS IN FRONT OF LABOR TEMPLE

Record Price for Corn

THIS year's corn crop promises to be the most valuable one this or any other country has ever produced. The Department of Agriculture at Washington, in its preliminary estimate of production, indicates that this year's crop will be more than a half billion bushels under that of last year, and the smallest in over ten years. Based on the department's figures of 70.7 cents per bushel, the crop as now estimated is worth $1,741,353,019, while the value of the 1912 record crop was $1,520,445,000. The previous most valuable crop was that of 1900, when it was worth $1,652,822,000. Present estimates indicate that the corn crop this year will be 2,463,017,000 bushels, compared with 3,124,746,000 bushels last year, and the yield per acre, 23 bushels, compared with 29.2 bushels last year, and 27 bushels, the ten-year average; average farm price 70.7 cents a bushel, compared with 58.04 cents last year. The drought wrought fearful havoc with the crop, perhaps the worst being in Kansas, where the yield is likely to be 3.2 bushels per acre, instead of 23 bushels last year. We have here an illustration of the law of political economy, which sometimes has exceptions, that increased production decreases values, and that decreased production increases prices, and also a law of divine Providence which places the values the same on both sides of the equation, and feeds and clothes the diligent workman and loyal child. The promise of God of bountiful harvests for ancient Israel is fulfilled in our land to-day.

The fountain of Jacob shall be upon a land of corn and wine; also his heavens shall drop down dew. (Deut. 33: 28.)

$4,000,000 Campaign

THE two weeks' campaign of the Young Women's and Young Men's Christian Associations to raise $4,000,000 was virtually assured of success by the announcement, at a banquet with 700 guests at the Hotel Astor on the night of November 10, that $1,986,346 had already been subscribed. Among the largest contributors were Mrs. Willard D. Straight (Dorothy Whitney), $300,000; Cleveland H. Dodge, $250,000; Miss Grace Dodge, $250,000, and Mrs. Finley J. Shepard (Helen M. Gould), $200,000. Three million dollars are to go to the Young Women's Christian Association, and one million to the Young Men's Christian Association of New York City. A volunteer force of one thousand workers, in squads of ten, each under a captain, was assigned to gather up the remaining $2,000,000 from a selected list of 20,000 friends of the cause. A huge thirty-foot clock over the one in the Metropolitan tower, another at Broad and Wall, and another at One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street and Seventh Avenue, indicated the progress made in the canvass. Mr. George W. Perkins gives his time to the work, and Mr. Charles S. Ward, who has had much success in such efforts elsewhere, is the director of the movement. The securing of $4,000,000 is a stupendous proposition, with eternal destinies as a consequence. What a warfare against the white slave traffic for the girls and poor women of the city, tempted in so many thousand ways! What an enemy of the saloon, the gambling table, and the vile resort for the boys and young men, every inch of whose pathway is set with some sort of evil snare! What a friend of bodily health, of intellectual training, of social culture, of moral and spiritual development! It is a Christian Association for both women and men; Christ is in the heart of these Associations, and has prompted this great effort for their promotion, which will do much in answering his prayer:

Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. (Matt. 6: 10.)

An Ideal Pastoral Letter

THE General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in New York City, which closed recently, discussed some questions at length as to name, orders of brotherhoods, Episcopal authority, etc., which interested especially the members of that denomination. Other questions considered were of national and world-wide significance. The pastoral letter sent out to the church by the House of Bishops at the close of the convention was ideal. Among other things it says:

God is in the glad paths of life not less than in the sad; and refinement of manners, gentleness, and reverence are obligations of our religion to which, we are constrained to say, the fashions of the day show scant regard. Even good taste and what used to be called common decency seem to make little appeal to many purveyors of popular entertainments, and in the social life of young people, forms of recreation are tolerated which tend to blunt the edge of conscience and tarnish the fine gold of maidenly modesty and reserve. Let us beware lest we forget that the body is, among other things, a measure and index, as well as an instrument for the support and development of moral life and character.

The letter has this climax with reference to Christ which is so true and timely that it should be universally read: "The unchanging need of men is the Christ. The church, the Bible, and the sacraments, history, science, and philosophy, government, education, and civilization are intended to be torches to reveal him to mankind, ties to bind him to the race and the race to him, and paths wherein he may walk with accustomed feet among men. We have in him a God who knows the meaning of human life. He entered our life by the gateway of birth. The sympathy of God with human life is thereby forever assured, and he added victorious power to his compassion. His love was stronger than death. He broke its bars that he might gain new entrance among men after such imperishable manner that never again can he be thrust away from us unless the whole race become apostate. The human experience of the ages is enshrined in his life. He is the Ancient of Days with the knowledge of the ages, but he is also the Spring of Youth, in touch with our times, ready, eager, burning to impart himself to us that we may serve even as he serves." The supremacy of Christ in the letter breathes the spirit of the apostle who declared Christ as his own personal Redeemer, and the only Saviour of mankind and Head of the church, and who said:

Christ is all, and in all. (Col. 3: 11.)

OUR MAIL-BAG

Questions and Answers

Secker, Detroit, Mich. There is something for which I have prayed a long time, but as yet have received no answer. Now what should I do—keep on praying, believing that God is testing my faith by withholding the answer, or believe that he sees that what I ask is not best for me to have? How may I know his will, so as to pray according to it?

We need constantly to guard against being self-centered in our prayers. Of course, God wishes us to tell him what we want in the same simple way that a child tells his parents. But it is necessary to be entirely willing that God's will shall be done, not ours. If we truly love him we shall come to be anxious, not so mueh that we shall be gratified as that he shall be gratified. What we shall be particularly eager about is to get better acquainted with him; to learn more of his will; and to seek by our efforts and our faith to have his will done in the world. But if the gift is something good and pure and worthy and we cannot help desiring it for ourselves, then we may keep on asking for it, either until it is received or until he makes us sure that it is not his will that we should receive it. At the same time we must remember that God is omniscient, all-wise. He sees into the future where we cannot. His ways are past finding out, and his design for us oftentimes beyond even our most sanguine hopes. He alone, however, knows the time and the circumstances under which his blessings and the answers to our prayers are best calculated to meet our requirements. He is our omnipotent Father, our kind Counselor and Friend. What more can we ask? All the way through we must trust him, never doubting for a minute that he loves us, that he longs to give us everything that will make us truly happy. Perhaps he wants you to believe more positively that this gift is his wish for you and that he will actually bestow it. "According to your faith be it unto you." "He that spared not his own Son but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?"

B. L. P., Middlebury, Vt. 1. No one can foretell the time of the second coming of Christ. To theorize on the subject is futile. The Bible says that "no man knoweth the day or the hour." 2. One thousand thousand is one million.

E. L. J., Ilion, N. Y. A young lady came to me to know if Mother Mary interceded for us. I said: "God sent his only Son to die for us, and in and through him we are saved, and Mary has nothing to do with our salvation" Am I right?

You are undoubtedly right. The full price of the world's salvation was paid by Christ on the cross. After a soul has once heard of Christ and his atonement, he needs no other help in approaching God than that of the divine Saviour. The New Testament is full of emphatic statements of the absolute sufficiency of Christ's sacrifice. There is "one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus." This is the message of the whole book of Hebrews. Read especially the first seven chapters. See also I Cor. 1: 30; Rom. 5; II Cor. 5: 18-21; Gal. 1: 3-9; Gal. 3; Gal. 5: 1-6; Gal. 6: 14-15, etc., etc. After we are regenerated, no one can possibly be nearer to us than Christ is. It surely seems, to say the very least, extremely foolish to ask any one else to convey a message to him for us when he himself is nearer than any one else can be.

E. A. R., Orlando, Fla. Unquestionably it is the habit of some imperfectly informed writers to exaggerate comparisons between the days of our forefathers and to-day. We think your views on the subject are quite reasonable, however.

J. G. W., Hubbard, Ohio. The Creed of the Apostles, according to tradition, was composed by the apostles themselves, who, during their stay at Jerusalem soon after the Ascension, agreed upon it as a rule of faith. One ancient writer avers that each contributed his part, Peter beginning, "I believe in God the Father Almighty," and John, James, Andrew, Philip, Thomas, Bartholomew, Matthew, James the Less, Simon Zelotes, Jude and Matthias each contributing his passage until the whole Creed was finished. This, however, is simply tradition. It is now generally admitted that the Creed, in its present form, is not of earlier date than the fourth century. None of the writers of the New Testament Gospels or Epistles makes mention of a Creed, nor does any ecclesiastical writer before the fifth century. It is regarded as impossible now to state definitely the authorship of the Creed, but its antiquity is unquestionable. It was first used in public worship in the Greek Church at Antioch, was introduced into the Roman Church in the eleventh century, and passed into the Church of England at the Reformation.

Reader, Montreal, Canada. The passage in Eccles. 12: 6 contains a double image. In verses 1-5 old age is represented, symbolically. The climax of natural life is reached in verse 6. In Eastern homes a gilded lamp, hung by a cord of silk and silver interwoven, gives light to the room. The "golden bowl" of the lamp answers to the skull and the "silver cord" to the spinal marrow, white and precious, which is attached to the brain. Then, changing the similitude, the fountain is named, from which water is drawn by a pitcher let down by a rope wound around a wheel, and when wheel and pitcher are broken, the life-giving draught ceases. It should be kept in mind that this gloomy picture of old age applies to those who have not "remembered their Creator" in youth and who, in consequence, have none of the consolations which it is now too late to seek.

L. T. P., Sanford, Fla. We do not regard it as a fair statement of conditions to say that the Latin republics south of us are unfriendly. On the contrary, they have given many evidences of friendship and confidence in our government, and never more emphatically than in their reception of ex-President Roosevelt.

E. F. B., California. We have a right to look to our Father to supply all our needs, physical and spiritual—not to grant us luxuries or such things as the world esteems most, but to give us what we really stand in need of. There is, however, a supreme request which we ought to make and even to be importunate until we get it, namely: a clean heart, a contrite spi of his dear Son who died for us. If we necessary to continually urge for pard

A Personal Letter

DEAR FRIEND:

On the following pages will be found THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Book Offers for 1914. We commend them to our readers who are about to renew subscriptions.

It is our expectation that the coming year will be even greater than the past. All of the standard features of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will continue to appear in its weekly issues, and many special features will be added during the year.

For instance: In addition to the regular weekly Sermons by eminent clergymen Prof. W. H. T. Dau, whose eloquence and high spirituality have already won him a warm welcome from our readers, will contribute the series of Daily Meditations which heretofore have been written by Dr. J. H. Jowett. Dr. Jowett will be represented by a series of discourses, which all will find delightful and spiritually helpful. Dr. Francis E. Clark, founder of the Christian Endeavor Society, is writing for us a new series describing the "Wonder Cities of the Orient," illustrated with photographs by Mrs. Clark. Dr. O. H. Pannkoke will contribute a series of articles on "The Church and the Workingman."

Pastor Sheldon's wonderful story, "Jesus Is Here!" will be continued weekly for some time to come. This wonderful work of the imagination, powerful, yet deeply spiritual in all its details, is being discussed everywhere, and of course you will not want to miss the rest of it. Immediately following its conclusion we will publish a splendid American story from the pen of Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady, entitled "The Little Angel of the Mountains," and later in the year we will give you an opportunity to read a new story about "Pollyanna," by Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter, whose famous little heroine was so instrumental in spreading the spirit of gladness over the whole Christian Herald Family.

These are but a small portion of the larger and varied program which is being arranged for 1914. Many other features are still in process of arrangement and will be announced later.

With the assurance that 1914 will be the biggest, most interesting and inspirational year in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I remain Cordially yours, GHS/CD Geo. H. Sandison Editor.

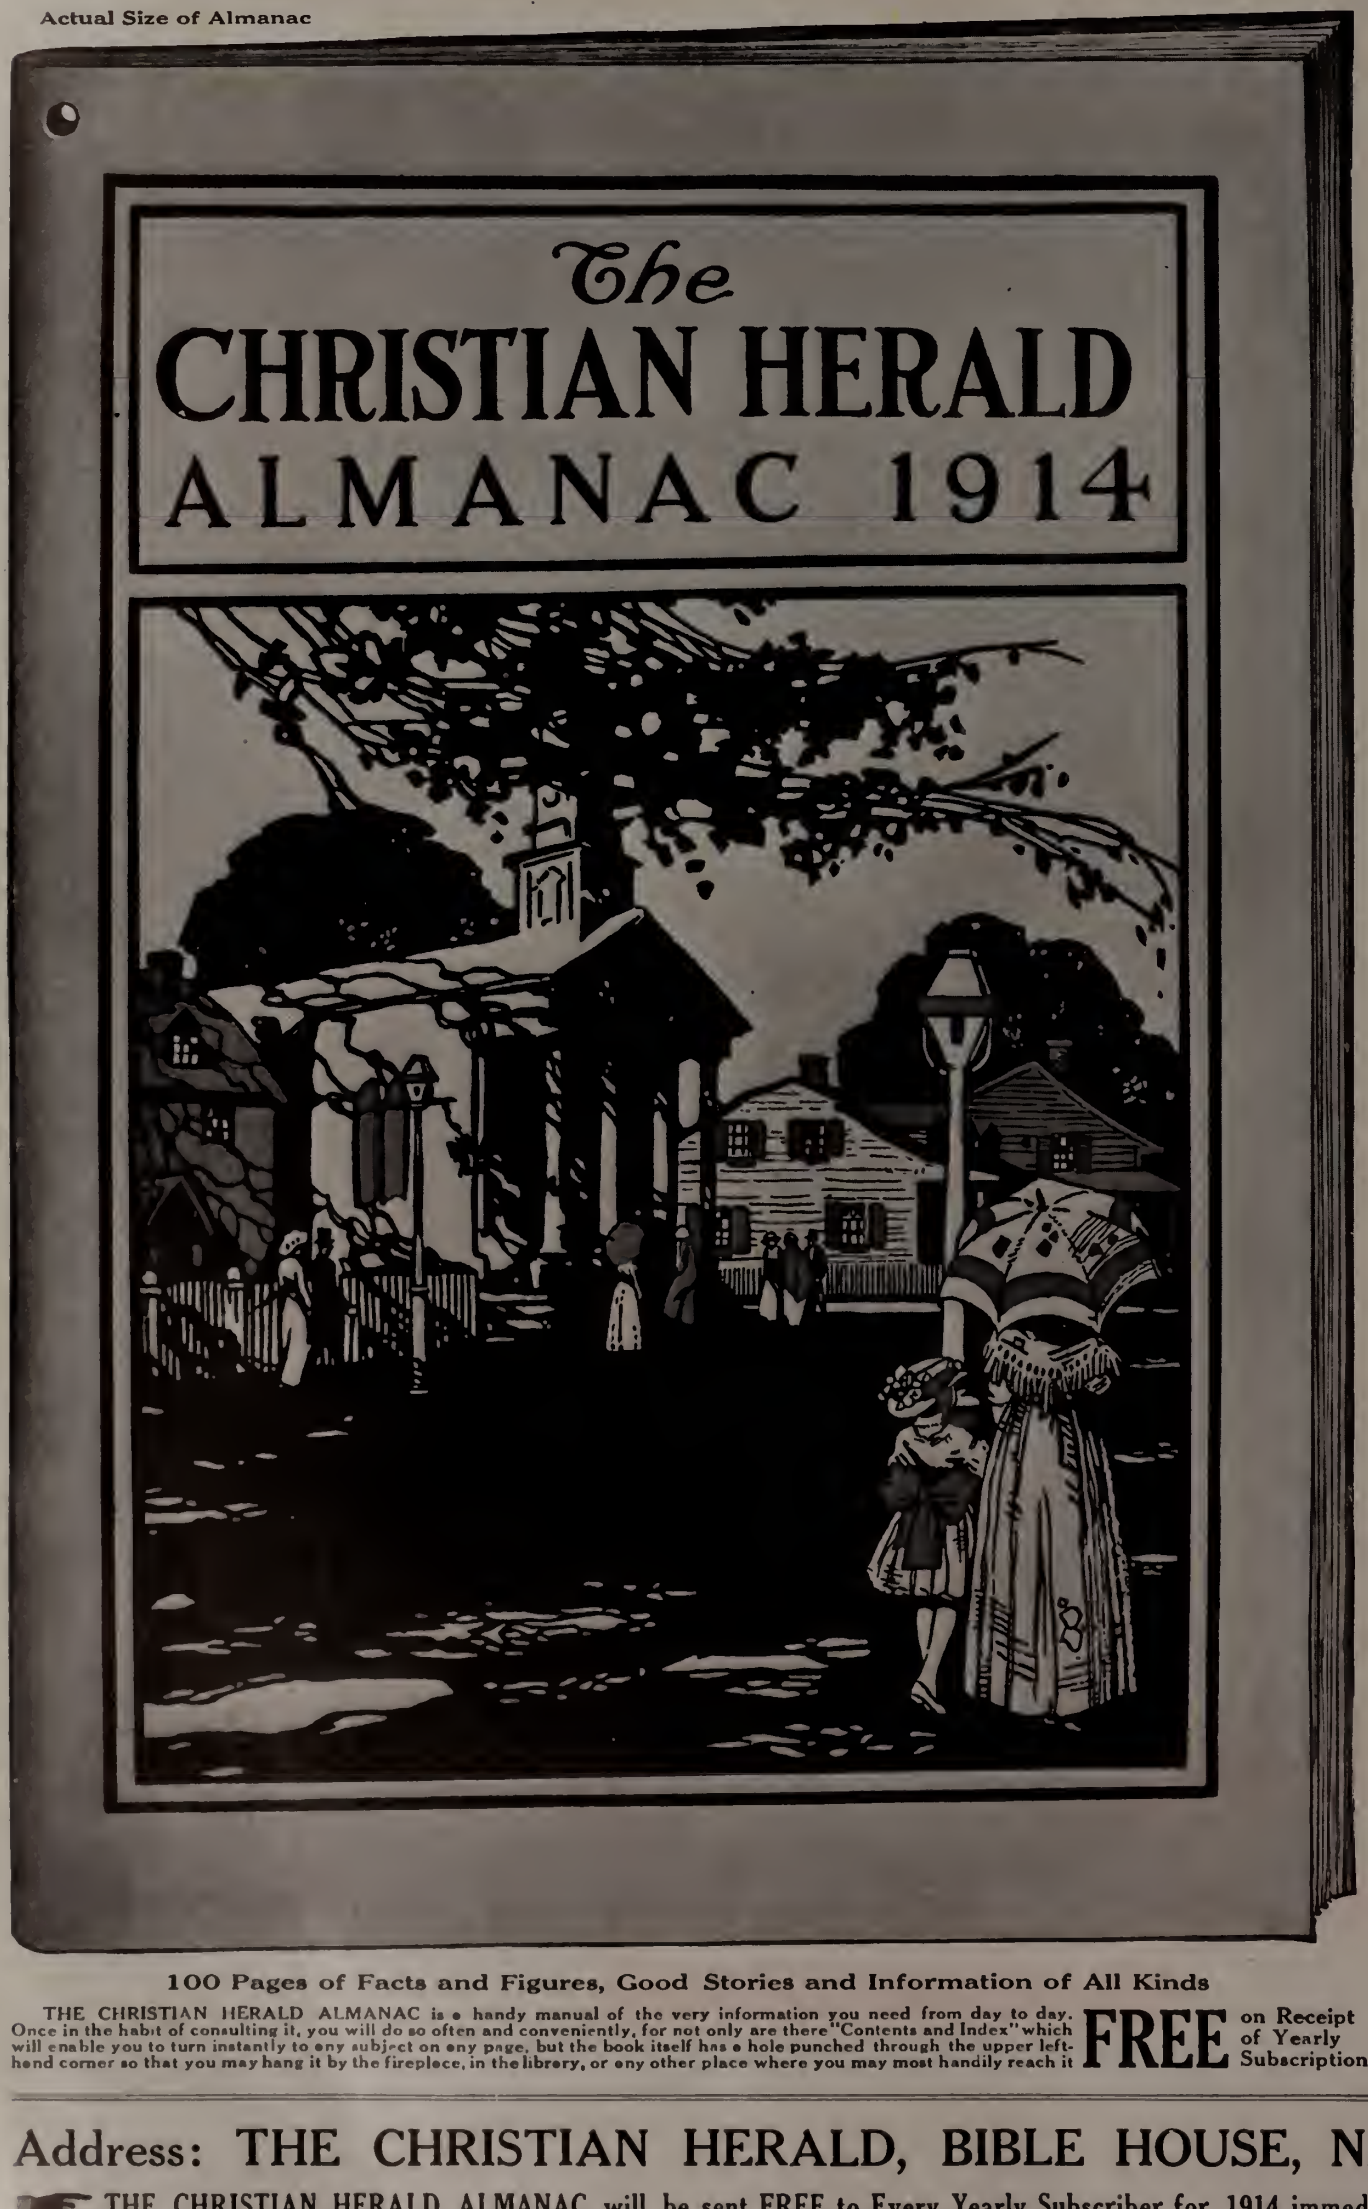
Actual Size of Almanac



THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ALMANAC for 1914 has been compiled with the definite object of supplying information in concise form on subjects which are difficult to locate. The calendar is there, of course, and added to that department this year is a full treatment of the astronomical phenomena and the story of our planetary family of 1914 from the authoritative pen of Berlin H. Wright. Coupled with the calendar will be found a record of the most important events of 1913.

The returns of the United States Government Census Bureau have been called upon for full and accurate information on our national Agriculture and Animal Industries, on Irrigation, Mining and Manufacturing. Direct from the Government Bureaus have come the statistics on our population, its origin, its distribution, etc.

Progress of Religion

The statistics and general information regarding the denominational divisions and sub-divisions of American Christianity have been revised and brought up to date. This section of the Almanac is a complete and reliable statement of the present standing of the denominations, made by their duly appointed officers.

Almost every denomination shows progress for the past year, and that progress is here set forth in figures and concise statements that cover the subjects thoroughly in the briefest and most useful fashion.

Other Features

In other sections of the Almanac will be found full statements of the Government of the United States and its possessions; the Judiciary of our nation and the governments of our near neighbors under the British flag. The new Tariff Law and its income features are fully defined.

Summaries of the Marriage Laws, the Inheritance Taxes and other important phases of State sovereignty are presented.

Such an able advocate as JANE ADDAMS tells Why Women Should Vote, while SENATOR ELIHU ROOT, MRS. FRANCIS MARCOE SCOTT and MRS. BARCLAY HOWARD support the opposing side of the modern argument. Also in women's realm are the sections on Beautifying the Home, Hints Toward Health, The Flower Garden and The Modern Girl.

The Fundamentals of the Faith

A SET OF WONDERFUL BOOKS FOR EVERY READER

FOR two or three years past, little volumes, about pocket size, have been coming at intervals to the editor of The Christian Herald through the mail from Chicago. Each volume bore the general title of The Fundamentals. The editor was surprised and delighted with the little volumes, which were filled with articles of great force and ability, written by some of the ablest expositors of the faith now living. Every book of the ten was a new and delightful surprise.

When The Christian Herald learned that these wonderful little volumes were produced through the liberality of two Christian laymen, who had set apart a fund to print and circulate them among pastors and teachers, it was decided that, if possible, the readers of The Christian Herald should have an opportunity to possess sets of these precious little books. Accordingly, through the kind co-operation of Dr. R. A. Torrey (Dwight L. Moody's long-time Gospel associate), an arrangement was completed by which The Fundamentals are to be supplied to us in any quantities desired, The Christian Herald pledging itself to make no profit on The Fundamentals but to sell them at cost of publication and expressage with renewal or new subscriptions.

This arrangement being satisfactorily completed, we are now enabled to announce that any subscriber sending in his or her own renewal, and desiring to secure a set of the ten precious volumes of The Fundamentals, may do so by accepting the offer outlined in the last paragraph of this article.

Right here, the interested reader will very properly pause to ask:

"What are The Fundamentals?"

We answer, with emphasis, that they are the ablest, wisest, clearest, and most convincing exposition of the foundation truths of the Christian faith that has ever been prepared by consecrated modern scholarship.

In this age of unrestrained religious freedom, with its allurements and specious cults, false doctrines and skepticism, both open and disguised, it is of the highest importance that the foundation principles should be clearly understood by those who profess Christianity. To meet this universal need, the best consecrated scholarship of our day has been enlisted in the preparation of a series of booklets dealing with The Fundamentals. They are accurate, enlightening, and conclusive. They deal with vital facts in the history, doctrine and development of the Christian Church and they present the belief of that church to-day in clear and simple language.

Noble Stories of Inspiration

My Garden of Hearts contains over sixty complete stories and a number of charming sketches. In these tales the author has dealt in her own delightful way with the romance and sentiment of life in city and country, among the rich and the poor, the cultured and the simple, and through it all she has woven the golden thread of love, and lighted it with the sunshine of a cheerful and optimistic philosophy. My Garden of Hearts is fragrant with kind deeds, with noble sacrifices, with tender sentiment and brave resolutions, and the people one meets there are such as we love to become acquainted with.

A Book of Thrilling Stories

WE BELIEVE The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton to be one of the most remarkable books of its kind yet published. More than all, it is true. The things described really happened. Yet Stanley, Livingstone and Peary all together did not have so many escapes from death as did this unassuming sailor man, who tells the story of his life with such convincing language as to call forth the remark from one reader, "He doesn't write like a literary man, but more like a man who has really been there."

496 pages, 185,000 words, enclosed in illustrated binding, with frontispiece picture of author.

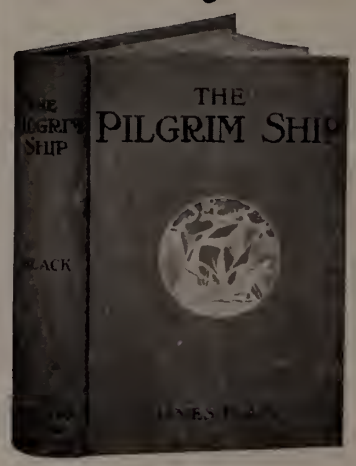
A Story To Be Read Aloud



NEVER has a more fascinating tale been penned than this. The Pilgrim Ship is a narrative of the voyage of the Prince of the Happy Isles to a far distant country and of the many extraordinary adventures that befell him. The Pilgrim Ship holds a charm for readers that is equaled by hardly any other book we know of; it allures, surprises and uplifts. As you read it you find many unexpected things happen, old friends and many near and dear ones are among the voyagers, and it would be strange indeed if you yourself are not among the number. As you read you become embodied with a new strength and the impulse of a new and lofty purpose.

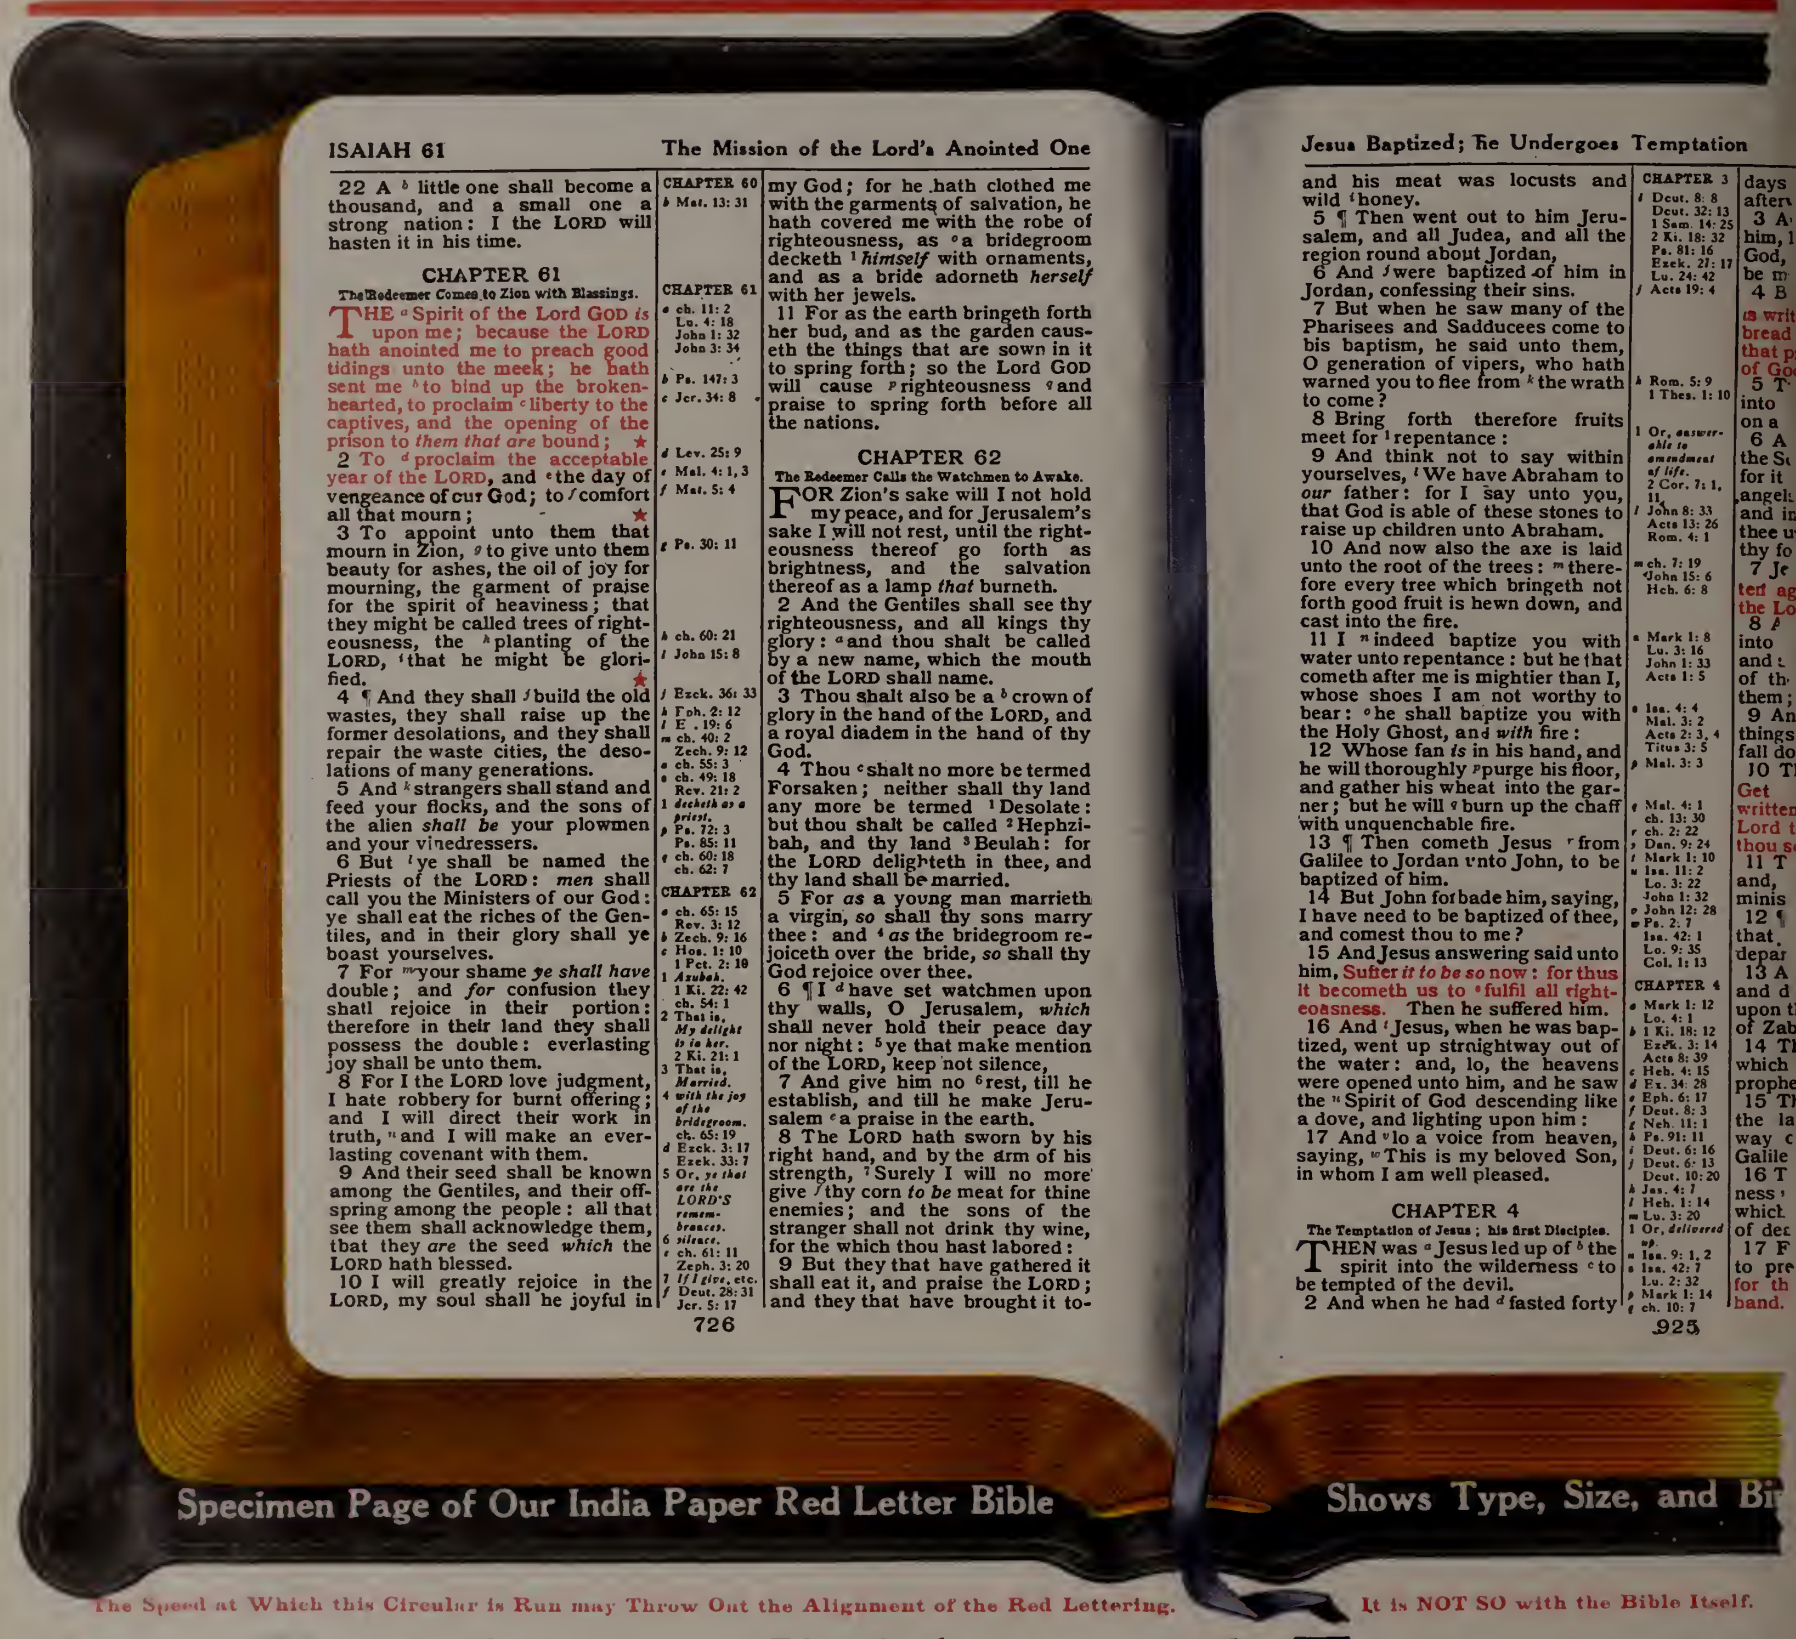
Only India Paper Red Letter Bible in the World



22 A [b] little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER 61

The Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings.

THE [a] Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me [b] to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim [c] liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; ★

2 To [d] proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and [e] the day of vengeance of our God; to [f] comfort all that mourn; ★

3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, [g] to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the [h] planting of the LORD, [i] that he might be glorified. ★

4 ¶ And they shall [j] build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.

5 And [k] strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.

6 But [l] ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.

7 For [m] your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.

8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, [n] and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall he joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as [o] a bridegroom decketh [1] himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.

11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause [p] righteousness [q] and praise to spring forth before all the nations.

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.

2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: [a] and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name.

3 Thou shalt also be a [b] crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.

4 Thou [c] shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed [1] Desolate: but thou shalt be called [2] Hephzi-bah, and thy land [3] Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.

5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and [4] as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

6 ¶ I [d] have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: [5] ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,

7 And give him no [6] rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem [e] a praise in the earth.

8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, [7] Surely I will no more give [f] thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored:

9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it to-

"JESUS IS HERE!"

the prayer that ended the conference, what winged angel was that speaking with matchless beauty in appeal to the Father?

And while the people were still seated, with heads bowed and tears on faces long untouched by feeling, he passed through the aisle to go and take his message to the crowd, whose impatient weariness could now be heard by those within. And as he went past him, Stanton was awed and stirred to the deep places of his really strong nature when Jesus turned his look upon him, and then, as he walked slowly through the church, seemed to include in his loving glance every single person there. At that moment Stanton, as he afterward told Virginia, understood how Jesus' look could change a person's whole life.

It was impossible for the great congregation to go out by the front doors, owing to the immense crowd outside. The people slowly and, for the most part, silently went out of the side entrances and even a considerable number through Mr. Maxwell's study.

Mr. Stanton and Virginia went that way. As they were going out, they heard Mr. Maxwell exclaim as he turned to face a man just leaving through the study,

"Mr. Carter!"

"Yes. No doubt you are surprised to see me among the prophets." Carter spoke sarcastically, but his face betrayed unusual agitation.

"I didn't happen to see you," Maxwell said quietly.

"No. I took the liberty of getting a front seat with the rest of the pastors. That is the reason you overlooked me."

"Who was that man?" Stanton asked of Virginia, as they made their way around to the front of the church.

"Mr. Jasper Carter, editor of the Raymond Gazette. I never saw him in church before. That is, not until last Sunday. He was here then."

"Did you notice his look?"

"Yes. It was the look of a man who is fighting some fear."

"Exactly." Stanton gave Virginia a glance of approval. "It was the same look on the face of the chancellor out at the university. It was fear and rage together. And, with it all, he looked baffled, as if for the first time in his life he had come face to face with a person who knew him clear to the depth."

"Yes," said Virginia. "Have you not felt that true of Him in the little while he has been here—as if he had known us all our lives?"

"Yes," murmured Stanton. "He needs not that any should tell him." 'He knows what is in man.' That to me is one of the greatest proofs that he is really Jesus."

When they had come out into the street, the mass of people was so dense that it was impossible for them to get very near the church. Mr. Maxwell and several of the pastors were near them. Jesus, as at the assembly, had requested that all formalities of introduction be omitted. More people were still coming to swell the crowd, and after Stanton and Virginia had come a little way into the edge of the circle already formed, in a few minutes it seemed to them they were forced farther into the multitude until they could see nothing in any direction but people.

And all eyes centered on the Figure up there on the top step by the front doors.

How marvelous that voice as it fell upon the ear of the farthest listener, compelling absolute attention! And what a message from him, who, as of old, looked upon the multitude with compassion because they were like sheep without a shepherd! Yea, even upon those who had come from idle curiosity, and those who already were beginning, like Jasper Carter, to hate and to fear him! And to those who were indifferent and sunk in selfish ambition—to all of them he spoke with such commanding power that not a sound except his voice went out over the people—only the regular city sounds on other streets, mingled now and then with the message he brought that day to the hearts of sinful, wayward, impure, greedy, hopeless men and women in that mixed multitude.

And then Stanton, his tall form towering up over nearly all around him, noted, with a look of anxious welfare for Virginia, as Jesus finished and calmly began to move down from where he had been standing, after gently asking the people to disperse, that the groups of men who had attracted his attention before the conference began, as if with concerted movement, to force their way up together toward Jesus. Cries arose. The multitude that had been standing there so long and was now released from the strain and acting on nervous impulse, might do any one of a number of things such as mobs do.

Still Stanton, shielding Virginia as much as he could from those who were beginning to surge back and forth around her, noted the figure of Jesus slowly moving down from the steps into the crowd.

Then suddenly right in front of him a woman started up with a great cry that for a moment drew all attention to her.

She was holding up in her arms a blind child, a little girl. What was she crying out? Hush! Hush! What is she saying?

"Give her sight, O Jesus! Open her eyes! It is not her fault! It is—"

Stanton could not hear the rest. Great confusion was about the person of Jesus. He had put out his hands, as if in deep compassion, on the child's head. Had he opened her eyes? Stanton could not tell. He had a dim glimpse of Maxwell and other ministers struggling to get nearer Jesus and crying out to the people to keep from violence. Even at that moment of fast-growing turbulence he was aware that dozens of press representatives with cameras were holding them up over their heads to get pictures, and then he found all his strength and coolness were needed to protect Virginia and himself from serious harm.

For the crowd had almost at once become an ungovernable mob. When the facts were all told, it was proved that the student groups were not responsible for the things that happened there in front of the church that day. A few of the rougher, more dissipated sort, who had been enraged at what Jesus had said out at the assembly, had joined in the brutality of the hour; but for the most part the students courageously and with noble dignity defended Jesus from actual blows struck at him as he tried to make his way through the dense and frightened, panic-stricken crowd.

Those who were chiefly responsible were groups of lawless men who had come in from neighboring towns, gatherings of ruffians who had for several days been prowling the streets of Raymond, attracted by the unusual excitement of Jesus' presence there—the same rabble that springs up suddenly in almost any manufacturing center on occasion of a wreck or a fire or a flood.

Men surged back and forth without knowing why. Every moment increased the unreasoning uproar and violence. Groups of men fought with one another. When a man went down, others trampled on his body with reckless selfishness. A spirit of mad fear swept over the throng.

Then it was that Richard Stanton thanked God in his heart for an athlete's strength. He had trained in the lumber camps of Michigan and Wisconsin and had made iron sinews and muscles on board the mission

"FAITH IS THE VICTORY"*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

HERE is a story that, if vividly told, will surely appeal to youth's interest in the wonderful and heroic. The new generation of Israel are at last up against one of the walled cities in the Land of Promise that their fathers, believing the ten faithless and fearful spies, counted more than a match for God. We shall soon see whether Joshua and Caleb, the two brave, because believing, spies, who are now the leaders, were right in saying that Israel with God was more than able to overcome these mighty walls.

Explorations a mile north of the modern village of Jericho, which some of us have visited, have uncovered buried walls of what was probably the second Jericho, which Hiel built at the cost of two sons. (I Kings 16: 34.) Dr. Langeneggar described the walls that surrounded the town as "cyclopean." Such, alas, probably, were the walls that confronted Israel, with which a civilized population having "silver and gold and vessels of brass and of iron" sought to protect itself from its foes.

Just before the campaign began, Joshua, reconnoitering near the besieged city, saw close at hand what seemed to be a man with drawn sword. Undismayed, and no doubt with his own sword drawn, Joshua challenged him: "Art thou for us or for our adversaries?" When the stranger revealed himself as "Captain of the Lord's host," of the legions of angels that fight with us in every battle for the right, Joshua bowed before his divine Commander, and presently received from him orders for the conquest of Jericho—orders so unlike those for any other battle that people all over the world have been talking of the Jericho campaign ever since.

The men of war were to march around Jericho once a day for six days in silence, and seven times on the seventh day in silence, and then at a signal on the seventh round were to shout. The walls would fall without the blow of a battering ram or any other human weapon, and the warriors of Israel were to rush into the city and complete the conquest with their own swords and spears. This plan, which no doubt greatly amused some in Jericho because it seemed so futile, and probably caused many in Israel to criticize not only Joshua but God, was carried out with the result foretold. In another part of the book we get an added fact: "The men of Jericho fought against Israel"—probably by a sally when the mysterious dumb show was going on day after day.

Manifestly, God planned this first battle in Palestine so that the Israelites might have no room for pride and could not fail to learn that their strength was in God. It has been said that the reason God made man last at the creation was that he might not brag that he had made the world himself, or most of it. In the case of Jericho, there could be no doubt God did it, though he required co-operating faith and prayer and obedience from his people, as in all such displays of his power.

It would not be profitable to linger more than a few moments to consider the means God may have used to break down Jericho's walls. An earthquake is the most probable way, for God uses natural means for supernatural ends. Two nearby cities had probably been so destroyed—Sodom and Gomorrah. Their sites have fallen so that the waters of the Dead Sea cover them. That signifies an earthquake at some time in that valley. The cataclysm that destroyed them seems to have been volcanic, with fiery eruptions and salty ashes, such as covered Lot's wife and still salt the water of the Dead Sea. Another means that God may have used is the rhythm of a marching host, which is so powerful that soldiers are required to "break step" in crossing a bridge. Or, it may be God guided the priests to strike the "keynote" of the wall and bring it down. Modern science teaches that structures have a "keynote" that, being struck even by a violin, causes them to tremble. In whatever way it was done, it was plainly God's act, and Israel was left with no room for pride but much for gratitude. Well might Israel sing, "To him who alone doeth great wonders, for his lovingkindness endureth forever.

Three great lessons stand out in this story: (1) Nothing is too hard for God; (2) the exercise of his power waits on the co-operation of men; (3) even in his judgments he remembers mercy.

Even in our day, cities which represent man's highest skill are as nothing when God's hand touches them. New York City, with all its railway lines and trolleys and telegraphs and telephones and fire engines, was in one day made dumb and powerless by a blizzard. Had it lasted three days, thousands would have starved. Who can stand before his cold? San Francisco's mighty walls broke like eggshells in the great earthquake. The Titanic was itself like a city afloat, with all the luxuries of a Paris, when, at a touch of an iceberg, it was swallowed up. I do not speak of these events as judgments, for God sendeth rain and snow and ice and earthquakes impartially upon the just and the unjust. But at least these incidents illustrate the powers at God's disposal in contrast to man's power in its highest expression.

When Mr. Moody had accepted the invitation to conduct revival meetings in Boston, despite the difficulties which he knew as one who had lived there as a young clerk, and of which many faint hearts reminded him, the pride and skepticism and conservatism and intellectualism, he said: "I know all the difficulties, and I am so glad I do not have to overcome them. God knows them too, and he is able." And God did bring down those walls of pride and doubt and conquered the city in a gracious revival. Many a preacher thinks he has a place of unconquerable difficulties. Many a teacher thinks so. Many a man thinks the business he is in is about the hardest one to be found in which to practice Christianity. Many a boy thinks his home surroundings or those of his boarding house so unfavorable that he really cannot live his religion. The answer is, in every case, "He is able"—"able to save," "to keep," "to make all grace abound."

But the eleventh chapter of Hebrews divinely sets to the front the human force that brought down the walls: "By faith the walls of Jericho fell down." All along that chapter, off against the grandest facts in Hebrew history, is God's explanation of their accomplishment—"by faith." God furnished the power, but only when human faith and prayer and obedience provided the connection. One of the greatest water power plants in the world has just been developed at Keokuk, Iowa, where the Des Moines Rapids in the Mississippi River, with a fall of only thirty-two feet, but yielding 300,000 horsepower, have been caged in a powerhouse more than a quarter of a mile long, whence power is sent to St. Louis, 144 miles away. Man could not have furnished this vast power, but man's act in building a dam, 4,278 feet long, across the river and in developing the plant has made this power a help to multitudes. So the power of God is in many cases powerless to help, under his wise plan of

A THANKSGIVING BLESSING

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THE years may come, and the years may go,
And the wind may be bitter cold,
And the thoughts that start from the lonely heart
May be tragic and sad and bold.

And the eyes so bright may have lost their light,
And the hair may be thin and gray;
But never fear, when the end is near,
There is still Thanksgiving Day.

Ah! what though the hair is white with years,
And what though the eyes are dim,
When once a year we may banish fear,
And lift up our thoughts to Him?

She folds her hands in gesture meek,
And her heart is high with her Lord;
And she bends her head o'er the table spread
With the best of her tiny hoard.

And her blessings rise to the boundless skies,
And the angels can hear her say
Her thanks to the Lord who filled her board
On this glad Thanksgiving Day.

Ah! the years may come and the years may go,
And the wind may be bitter cold;
But folks will pray on Thanksgiving Day,
When the sun and the stars are cold.

arousing human activity, until man has, by faith and prayer and obedience, brought that power into helpful relation to the salvation or blessing of an individual, a city, a State, or a nation.

The Jericho story suggests that for the best results we need not alone individual co-operation with God in individual faith and obedience, but co-operation with our fellow men on a large scale, as in that marching host, keeping step in a unity that is a power to overthrow our foes, and with a marching music of unity that has in it the keynote of the walls we seek to tear down. Dr. J. F. Hinkhouse, who is doing good work in resuscitating cross-lanes congregations in Iowa, has amplified a Bible passage aptly in giving his people the following watchword:

"Come thou with us and we will do thee good" is a fine proposition. A better one is: "Come thou with us and we will do each other good." But better still is this: "Come thou with us and together we will do good to others."

"Do you see those splendid young men over there?" said a Sunday school superintendent to a visitor. "They are building up the class man by man. They select one man to be won for the class, and seven of them call on him successive days, if necessary, till he comes. They have been at it since the day they studied the Jericho lesson. This capital story, told more fully by the Sunday School Times, should start some other classes into such a sevenfold compassing of Jericho in their own towns.

The sort of men that singly or unitedly can bring down Jericho's walls are the men who are themselves earthquake-proof — men who may sway like the earthquake-proof pagodas of much-shaken Japan, that sway but do not fall in the weekly earthquake shocks that come in a total of thousands in every year. There are many things to shake our faith and our peace and our loyalty to God, but it is possible to build up such permanence of character that one can rest in the assurance that neither life, nor death, nor things present, nor things to come, shall ever break his loyalty to Christ.

There are in this loud-swelling tide
Of human care and crime,
With whom the melodies abide
Of the everlasting time:
Who carry music in the heart
Through busy street and crowded mart,
Plying their daily toil with swifter feet
Because the inmost soul some holy strain repeals.

A missionary application of the lesson is appropriate. The walls of heathenism have been very thick and high, and it has not been for six days only, but often for six years, that missionaries have patiently marched around Jericho before they have seen any result. One of the walls that is but recently breaking down after a century of marching is the wall of Brahmanism in India, begun by a convention of one thousand priests at Amritsar, who resolved to renounce their opposition to progress.

boats of Labrador. And he needed every ounce of a splendid animal vitality now. Among the whirling of forms, fists striking, bodies hurled right and left, Virginia, bold of heart as she was and used in past years to brutal scenes in the Rectangle, was in deep peril. Stanton cleared a circle about her. It closed up again. By the use of tremendous strength he defended her again and again from mad rushes that would have hurled her to the ground. He had put his arm about her, and with one word and look she understood her great peril and his necessary act. Indeed, it is probably true that so fast had Virginia, during that tremendous week she had known Stanton, come along the path of her affection and feeling for Mr. Maxwell's assistant, that Stanton's protection at this unexpected crisis came like a culmination of weeks of acquaintance. At that moment it seemed to Virginia that she had known Stanton always. And as his arm encircled her, and she felt his tremendous strength and courage exerted all for herself, a perfect thrill of pride and joy in him possessed her. Once he had staggered and almost fallen. She had cried out, and dragged at him with both hands. Blood was flowing over his face, and his coat had been torn off. The mob was fighting for its life regardless of any one. Mad, infuriated, trampling, roaring, it swept up and down and around in great eddying circles of fury.

And then, when even Stanton with all his courage had despaired of safety for Virginia and himself, a Voice came over the multitude, resonant, commanding, musical, calm. It rose clear and distinct, deeply fascinating, seeming to catch up and enclose all the savage clamor and rage of the people.

It was the voice of Jesus. Stanton wiped the blood out of his eyes and looked. He stood near the place where the woman had held up the little blind girl. He was now holding the child in his own arms, and on his face was a look of perfect triumph as he spoke to the multitude.

And as Stanton looked in perfect amazement, he saw arms and fists that had been raised and striking, suddenly dropped. The roar of the mob died away. The wild rushing of bodies was stilled. Men glared at one another, but no longer fought. What had the Voice said? Stanton tried to repeat it. What? "Peace! Be still." Once he had said it as they waked him out of his needed sleep in the little boat on the wind-swept waves of Galilee. Now he was saying it here. What? And the mob was awed and stilled! What manner of man is this that can quiet a senseless mob of infuriated men?

While all your issues are most interesting and stimulating, I think the one referred to touches the climax. I had intended to specify certain articles, but where so many are of surpassing interest and value, it would be difficult, if not invidious, to do so.

GRACE BEFORE MEAT

ALICE J. WHITTIER

OUR Father, round this board we bow—
O Friend of all the year and way—
In grateful joy. Together now
Our hearts keep glad Thanksgiving Day.
For fruitful field, for well set board
We thank and praise and bless thee, Lord.

That thou our land, the East, the West,
Through all the year, come night, come morn,
From sea to sea hast greatly blessed
With full fed days and stores of corn.
For Living Bread — thy Holy Word—
For this we praise and thank thee, Lord.

Yea, though the nations toil and smoke
Mid war and plague and bitter strife,
Thy hand has warded every stroke,
And saved in peace our country's life.
For thou hast kept our lovèd land
Within the hollow of thy hand.

That from our little world of here
Few friends have passed beyond the flood,
But wider grown our circle dear,
The kinship of the heart and blood.
And thou hast added yet the grace
And blessing of the baby face.

Hast given health and human cheer,
And greater things; a work to do:
Strength for the spirit prone to fear:
Love, faith and hope and courage true,
Till all may know that from the sod
Our souls have grown their inch toward God.

Thanks for the way, though strange and long:
Thanks for the days rich with thy love:
For future days, for sigh and song:
For homes on earth and Home above.
All days are good when with thee trod:
Receive our thanks, dear Father God.

SENSE AND NONSENSE

CONDUCTED BY JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE

A THANKSGIVING DINNER

I TOLD Josiah we had been real prosperous durin' the past year, had been blessed with health and happiness, and I wanted to have an old-fashioned Thanksgivin' dinner and invite a few friends to help us be thankful.

And he sez, "I don't need any help when I'm eatin' one of your good turkey dinners; I can be thankful enough myself for a dozen."

But I carried the day and invited the children and their families, and Elder Minkley and his wife, and got out my best china and linen and made a fuss.

Marietta Holley
Author of Samantha at Coney Island

And the blessin' that good old Elder Minkley asked at the table brought anew to our minds and hearts all the countless multitude of things we had to be grateful for to a over-rulin' Providence. All the wonders and glories of this wonderful age we're livin' in, the blessings of freedom, peace, health, home, friends, love, boundless good, that we sometimes forget to be grateful for, and which it duz us good to set down and meditate on once a year anyway—he condensed it all into a short sermonette, and I enjoyed it first-rate. But Josiah wriggled round and acted kinder oneasy at the last. He wuz afraid the oyster soup would git cold—it wuz on the table when we set down—but it didn't. I'd het the cups and it wuz warm enough and delicious. And when that wuz partook of, the next course, brought on by Philury, presented a noble appearance.

The roast turkey loomed up proudly in front of Josiah, flanked on the north side by a delicately browned duck, and on the south by a white, flaky chicken pie, while occupying seats of honor, as become their separate worths, wuz different kinds of vegetables: little white onions, tender as love itself, yet hull and round; squash, yeller as gold blended with cream and butter; potatoes, both Irish and South American, and the rich red of cranberry sass contrasting beautiful with amber jell, and the crumbly green of little sweet cowcumber pickles; butter golden yellow, breads both brown and white—all these and more met the eye and taste, and cakes and pies and pudding and fragrant coffee yet to appear on the festivorous board.

Of course, Josiah, as usual, indulged a little too freely in the delicious viands, but on the hull, happiness rained, and good nater and thankfulness abounded. And after dinner the company stayed quite a while, and Maggie played some hims on the organ, and we all jined in and sung 'em, and we visited back and forth and had a good growin' time, and after the last one left, Josiah said:

"We did git up a splendid dinner, you and I, didn't we, Samantha?"

"For the land's sake," sez I, "what did you do about the cookin'?"

"Why," sez he in a injured axent, "I killed the old gobbler." I see his lineament looked real hurt, and I sez:

"So you did, Josiah, I should never have dasted to tackle the old creeter."

We had so many different kinds of food that more than half the turkey wuz left, and after Philury had washed the dishes I dispatched her with it and a basket of other good things to a poor family that I knew would be thankful for it, and I set there alone by the cheerful fire-blaze. I wuz tired, a agreeable, happy tired.

I'd been more'n a week workin' at that dinner by spells, what with the fruit cake and mince pies, but I didn't begretch the time or labor. No, I sot there in my cushioned arm-chair, real happy and serene, lettin' my mind

Old Farms Made New

An old man can never be made young. A worn-out reaper is fit only for the junk heap. A horse that is past usefulness must be retired.

But an old farm can be made new!

The owner of a hundred-acre farm was beating all his neighbors in crops, yet his business was a fizzle.

It looked as if he'd have to quit the game to make a living. But he told his troubles to a farm-management expert. The expert got busy and made that farm over from pasture to corncrib. He moved fences, started rotations—did just the things an expert replanning a factory would do.

And when he was done the deficit had been turned into a profit.

For several years the Department of Agriculture, through its field agents, has been experimenting with various farms, with the owners' coöperation, along the lines of system and efficiency. We are able to publish the results in a series of four articles, of which this is the first, under the title, Old Farms Made New. They tell how to replan a farm for economy in time and labor.

PECANS—A Tree Crop of Tomorrow

A plantation owner set out a sixteen-acre pecan orchard, at a cost of $600. Three years later a friend asked, "What will you take for it?"

"It's not for sale," the owner answered, and $1800, $3000, $4000, wouldn't budge him. Why?

"Because when it is ten years old I can sell it for $16,000—$1000 an acre," he declared. Now it is nine years old and he wouldn't take $16,000, because it will soon be paying twenty per cent on that valuation.

Tree Crops is the next big thing in farming, says Dr. J. Russell Smith, and he understands this subject better than anyone we know. He studied the nut orchards of this country, and some friends of the University of Pennsylvania thought so highly of his work that they sent him on an 18,000-mile trip through Southern Europe and North Africa, where pecans, chestnuts, walnuts, olives, dates and the rest have flourished for centuries.

He returned with a new faith in tree crops. He tells in this series of articles how the nut industry must be reëstablished in America.

Fresh Fowl—or Frozen

Cold storage is a saving grace to the farmer—it prevents glutted markets and equalizes prices the year round.

The poultryman especially will find that the cold-storage plant is his best friend. Here's a story that tells what it means to you as no other article you ever read has told.

A Woman and a Windmill

In the homesteading game on Uncle Sam's free land women win out as well as men; women of pluck and common sense, like this woman who took a windmill along with her when she went out to try to make a home for herself.

"Any woman can do it," she says, "if she will buckle down cheerfully and not try to be a parlor ornament."

This real story of a real woman is better than fiction.

Out West—The Little Landers

Can a family farm a quarter of an acre and get a living out of it? That's the claim back of Southern California's Little-Lander movement. Ever hear of the little landers? We have investigated them. You may be interested in the result.

These Are a Few of the Big Features You Will Find in One of Our Four December Issues. But They Are Not All

Growing Alfalfa for Market. A hundred dollars an acre in a droughty year looks good to Kansas farmers, and their cornfields are rapidly becoming alfalfa fields. Have you tried alfalfa as a money crop?

When Dairymen Get Together. For a long time the dairymen have been divided into many factions. Dealers and producers have waged continual warfare. Ice cream manufacturers have been misunderstood. Breeders have followed false gods and have maligned each other's breeds. But harmony is coming. The last National Dairy Show was really a peace conference as well as a school for producers, dealers and manufacturers. Our article on the Dairy Show will have a new point of view. It's not merely a list of prize winners, but a foresight into dairy futures.

Progressive Agriculture. A girl made $107 from tomatoes on a tenth of an acre. A boy raised 167 bushels of corn on an acre. Uncle Sam is teaching 92,000 boys and 33,000 girls how to get the most from the farm, and they are teaching their fathers and mothers.

Then there's a great woman's department, with the advance guard of Christmas shopping suggestions and holiday recipes and helpful hints for the "Mainspring of the farm"—the wife and mother. And a dozen more articles dealing with the two important features of the farm business—economy in production; profit in marketing.

THE WHITE HOUSE TURKEY

IT HAS been several decades since a housekeeper at the White House in Washington has been called upon to worry over that problem so all-important to the average housewife, namely, the provision of a turkey for Thanksgiving. Each successive November, for more than a third of a century, there has arrived at the stately residence on Pennsylvania Avenue a splendid turkey as a Thanksgiving present for the President and his family.

Some years the Chief Magistrate has received at this season a number of turkeys as tokens of esteem from admirers in various parts of the country; but the White House cook has always rested easy, knowing that, whatever the contributions from other sources, there was the surety of a New England bird fit to grace the presidential table. This dependence has been due to the fact that every autumn, since President Grant's time, a turkey has been sent to the White House by Horace Vose of Westerly, R. I.

Carefully packed in a wooden box, the presidential bird comes by express, and although it is usually timed to arrive at the White House kitchen on the day before Thanksgiving, the delivery has on one or two occasions been so delayed that White House cooks have grown nervous lest it be necessary, at the last minute, to purchase a turkey in the open market of Washington, where the White House housekeeper buys the other necessary supplies for the holiday dinner.

Mr. Vose has not missed a Thanksgiving for upward of two-score years in sending his substantial remembrance, and Republican and Democratic Presidents have been treated impartially. Some years the turkey has been heavier than in others; but while thirty - six - pound birds hold the record, there has never been much variation in size, and no Thanksgiving turkey that came to the White House has weighed less than twenty-eight pounds. Mr. Vose selects the presidential turkey from hundreds of eligibles, and gives especial attention to the bird for weeks in advance of killing time.

It has become a sort of tradition with successive Presidents that the Vose turkey shall grace the board on Thanksgiving, no matter what other candidates there are for the honor, although I believe that one Chief Magistrate could not resist the temptation, on one occasion, to substitute a wild turkey that had been sent to him from Virginia.

roam on the oncounted blessin's I wuz enjoyin', and feelin' as thankful in sperit as the day called for, when all of a sudden I hearn a voice behind me and a large package and a small one wuz laid in my lap. It wuz my pardner's voice and he said:

"Jest onroll them packages, Samantha, and see what you have to be thankful for this beautiful Thanksgivin' day. See the dress I've picked out for you, my own self, askin' no advice, nor takin' none, and the beautiful neck adornment to go with it."

I onrolled 'em with tripidation and agitated fingers. I had had experiences in his choices before; I had suffered from 'em from the very altar as you may say. The dress wuz the cloth wimmen sometimes git for kimonos, a yeller ground with large palm leaves of a vivid scarlet, and the red silk necktie wuz large and long, with golden sunflowers bloomin' on the ends.

Sez he, "Jest feel of the thickness of the cloth, Samantha. It will wear like iron; you'll never be able to wear it out." At that thought I instinctively begun a deep groan, but managed to change it into a queer smile, as queer a one as I ever see, and I've gin queer smiles from first to last. (Every woman has, when onexpected company comes washin' day, etc., etc).

"When you go into Jonesville meetin' house by my side in that beautiful dress, with that elegant scarf drapin' you in front, what a proud man I will be. There won't another sister in the meetin' house begin with you in looks."

"No, indeed, Josiah, they couldn't; it hain't possible."

"No, Samantha, and I want you to let your mind dwell on't, what you've got to be thankful for this lovely Thanksgiving Day."

And, even as he spoke, the cloud lifted. A bright thought suddenly shone into my mind: the settin'-room lounge needed a new cover. The red scarf wuz jest what I wanted to set off the dark colors in my silk quilt. So I sez with real gratitude in my voice and a nateral home-made smile:

"I am thankful, Josiah," for brighter than the thought of the destination of the gifts come the idee that I don't believe we any of us think on so much as we ort to: that it is not alone for what we have, and have to do, that we should be thankful, but for what we do not have, and do not have to do.

FANNY CROSBY'S POEM

To the Bowery Mission and Its Earnest Workers on Their Anniversary Day

DEAR Bowery Mission, while I trace
Thy noble work in good or ill,
Within my soul there hath a place
That none on earth can ever fill.
Thy fervent zeal I'll ne'er forget,
As in the past, I love thee yet.

My grateful thoughts thy name recall,
And this shall be my constant prayer,
That He who marks the sparrow's fall
May keep thee safe beneath His care.
Thy work of grace I'll not forget
Dear Mission home, I love thee yet.

A welcome now to you I bring,
Your every burden needs bear,
In faith and hope in Christ your King
Cast care in Him your weight of care
Thy no more need to suffer need
And find the bliss of perfect love.

Oh, be who toil for Jesus' sake,
And labor on through cool and ill,
His promised word He will not break,
Remember he is with you still.
And though ere long your sun may set,
'Twill rise in heaven; he loves you yet.

I may not join your loyal band,
Nor help to swell your choral lay,
Nor clasp in mine each proffered hand,
On this your anniversary day.
Your noble deeds I'll ne'er forget;
As in the past, I love you yet.

CONGRATULATIONS FROM COLORADO

Permit me to join with all your friends in good wishes upon the thirty-fifth anniversary of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I regard this paper as perhaps the greatest achievement in Christian journalism the world has ever known. It speaks volumes for the spirit of the men who have conducted its affairs in all these years. May its spirit never be tarnished, nor its policy be changed. May its benevolences also never be lessened; and may it continue to merit the favor it has throughout the world.

Grape-Nuts a Perfectly Balanced Food

No chemist's analysis of Grape-Nuts can begin to show the real value of the food—the practical value as shown by personal experience.

It is a food that is perfectly balanced, supplies the needed elements for both brain and body in all stages of life from the infant, through the strenuous times of active middle life, and is a comfort and support in old age.

"For two years I have used Grape-Nuts with milk and a little cream, for breakfast. I am comfortably hungry for my dinner at noon.

"I use little meat, plenty of vegetables and fruit, in season, for the noon meal, and if tired at tea time, take Grape-Nuts alone and feel perfectly nourished.

"Nerve and brain power and memory are much improved since using Grape-Nuts. I am over sixty and weigh 155 lbs. My son and husband seeing how I improved are now using Grape-Nuts.

"My son, who is a traveling man, eats nothing for breakfast but Grape-Nuts and a glass of milk. An aunt, over 70, seems fully nourished on Grape-Nuts and cream." "There's a Reason."

THE FIRST THANKSGIVING

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THE Pilgrims landed on the rock-bound shore. And they fell on their knees, praising the God of Hosts. Then they planted corn and tilled the fields and hewed down the forest places. And they built log huts, and raised stockades, and killed animals that they might eat. And they passed through famine and disappointment, discouragement and death.

The savages came, curious and friendly. They grew interested in the strange white people and their stranger ways. And they taught them many things about the new country. It was then that the Pilgrims began to prosper.

Autumn came and the crops were harvested—crimson and gold and russet were the spoils of the season. And as the turkeys grew fat and the stores piled high, the Pilgrims became happier and more contented. And at last in the exuberance of their joy they invited their savage friends, and they cooked and roasted in honor of the guests, and they made a feast. It was Thanksgiving Day.

The boats steam up through the Narrows into New York harbor, toward the welcoming statue that symbolizes the spirit of our country. And the new pilgrims—pilgrims who are ignorant, and poorly nurtured, and badly clothed—enter the land of the free. And the gateway is called Ellis Island.

A wonderful system rules at this gateway. And smoothly, steadily, all the time the wheels keep rolling on, admitting the right ones, deporting the impossible kind, helping the newcomer to find a home—and a family.

The buildings are white and red, and the close-cropped hedges are a vivid green in the proper season; but against the beautiful background the people stand out, dressed in the costume of peasants, untaught, curious. It is hard to think of them as pilgrims.

Over near the doorway of the first building I entered there hung the flag-draped picture of George Washington. His benevolent eyes seemed to follow us as we crossed the floor between the waiting rows of foreigners who were hunting for relatives or friends. Men, busy over records at their desks, looked at us kindly when we passed, and whispers in shrill foreign tongues came faintly to our ears. The pilgrims were talking about us.

Down the corridor we went and up in an elevator that carried us very near to our destination—the office of the superintendent.

"Thanksgiving!" the superintendent said, after our greeting. "I don't know—Thanksgiving isn't a very big day down here. But I will show you around if you care to go."

Yet Ellis Island is a scene of constant thanksgiving.

Down the corridor we went—a corridor clean and sweet-smelling, despite the number of foreigners who daily pass through it. It had been an easy day: only 1,554 strangers had come to our shores! Finally we reached the large entrance room. A few people, Italians, were clustered at the far end of it, talking and gesticulating in a noisy manner, their wide, excited eyes fixed upon our faces. A little girl crouched in the corner near our feet. Her old-world face was framed in a scarlet shawl, and her tiny body was encased in a tight-fitting dress of green and purple. She was very quiet, only her hands clasped and unclasped on her kerchief, and her great eyes never left us. She was frightened at the new land, at all the noise and the hurry; but when we smiled down into the eager little face her mouth curled up sweetly and she murmured a gracious sentence in her native tongue. We left her there, and somehow as I walked on, a strange responsibility crept over me. Are we capable of helping these—our pilgrims? Can we show them the Promised Land?

But the superintendent was speaking.

"I am going to show you the dining-room and the kitchens," he said, "and our bakery. We bake tons of bread every day. Why, down here we even have our own ice plant."

The culinary department would have delighted any housekeeper. The tables were neatly set, and in the kitchen a fragrant soup was being made. The bakers, in their comparatively small room, moved quickly about, kneading, cooking, drawing the brown loaves from the oven. Vaguely I longed for my paint box as I saw the white figures hurrying about in the dull red glow of their fires. But we only lingered for a moment.

"I am going to let you see the immigrants claimed by their friends," said the superintendent, as he guided us through a series of apartments, dormitories, baggage-rooms, resting-rooms and ticket-exchanges. Swiftly he led us to a hallway that was divided into two parts. In one corner the pilgrims waited; in another their families were showing the necessary credentials. Smilingly, the superintendent turned toward us.

"Do you see that post at the doorway?" he questioned, and as we glanced at it, "Some call it the kissing-post. It is there that the long-separated families meet." And then we saw that he spoke the truth. For, while he was talking, an excited Neapolitan in American clothes ran out of the tiny gate. At the foot of the kissing-post his family met him—a young wife and two tiny children. And there they were reunited—at the gateway of our land! The gateway of Liberty had become their gate of Thanksgiving.

I wish that I might tell you of the enormous hospital, of the good meals, of the splendid sanitary system that keeps our country wonderfully free from a great many troubles—troubles such as we scarcely dream of.

Hundreds of years ago the Pilgrims garnered their grain and made a harvest feast of friendship and Thanksgiving. And now, once a year, we gather together our families and eat the feast that has grown to be a habit with us. And once a year at Ellis Island the new pilgrims sit down to a dinner of turkey and other good things. They do not know that they are celebrating Thanksgiving, for they are not acquainted with our customs or our tongue. But we, who are thanking God in our own way, should ask him very humbly that we be made worthy of the trust, and that some day the pilgrims may learn the real meaning of our Thanksgiving feast-time.

THANK GOD FOR THE POSTMAN

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

HE TRUDGES along through the snow and the sleet,
With a pack that is heavy to bear;
The slush of the roadway has hampered his feet
And the whiteness has powdered his hair.
But he stands by the gate with a smile on his face
And his whistle is cheery and gay;
Oh, people who live in a far-away place,
Thank God for the postman to-day!

He carries a message that comes from the heart
Of a boy who has gone from his home,
And sometimes a letter to make the tears start
From a soul that is sad and alone.
The news of a world that is far from our sight
Is stored in his magical pack,
And he mingles the sorrow with words of delight,
For he carries a world on his back.

Through city and country, through byway and street
He comes to the home great and small;
And we wait for his coming; he brings such a treat,
A message of cheer to us all.
And so in this season of harvest and joy,
When the crops have been stored safe away,
We raise to the heavens our humblest prayer,
"Thank God for the postman to-day!"

DEPARTMENT OF INVESTMENT COUNSEL

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

Neither THE CHRISTIAN HERALD nor any other publication can guarantee the value of investment securities. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns. Any advice given is an expression of our conclusions, based upon information we believe to be reliable; but we must not be held responsible, should any loss arise from its acceptance.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

L., FLORIDA. The Shorty Hope Mining Company has no mention in our lists. We doubt that your stock possesses any value.

D., OKLAHOMA. We fail to see how the Haney Fire Apparatus Company can afford to furnish a position at $4 per day in the factory at Tampa, Fla., to every farmer in your State who will buy stock at $3 per share. It looks like a pretty generous offer, a pretty stiff premium to pay for capital. Perhaps you have not quoted Mr. Haney's offer quite correctly; but if you have, we should be very much inclined to say no, without further investigation.

A., INDIANA. We cannot offer your stock to "J. W. H." nor can we give you his address. Names of financial inquirers are never given. Also, that which you may consider an "absolutely safe investment" may not comport to our standards. There are very few investment securities which we consider absolutely safe. Indeed, we never apply such a superlative term to any security, for we think it misleading.

S., WYOMING. No value attaches to your Douglas & Lacy stock. This firm went out of business half a dozen years ago. Thousands of persons "invested" with the concern, and the total loss ran into millions of dollars. The saddest part of it is that the firm actually possessed some real mines, it is said, and had these properties been developed, as they should have been, the stockholders might not have lost all of their invested money.

K., OHIO. One phase of your inquiry is a very important one; it involves a legal matter, and you should consult a lawyer. The laws governing trust estates are different in different States, and securities which may be legal investment for trust funds in one State may not be legal in another State. The expenditure of trust moneys is a serious matter. We can only specify the kinds of bonds we believe to be desirable, which we have done in our letter, without naming particular issues.

L., NOVA SCOTIA. You ask us to express an opinion as to the value of lots which are being offered for sale in McLeod, Alberta, at $260. We cannot express opinion regarding the value of real estate no matter where it is situated. We always advise our readers to look at land personally before they buy it. Inasmuch as Nova Scotia, where you live, is some 3,000 miles from Alberta we doubt that you are likely to make the purchase of the lots in question if you follow our advice.

B., MINNESOTA. The State Mutual Life Assurance Company of Worcester, Mass., was incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts, March 16, 1844, and began business June 1, 1845. It is a mutual company, solvent, with an ample surplus. Its actuarial methods are conservative and sound, we believe. The investments are of high grade. It issues only annual dividend policies. The company is considered in the first class for honorable treatment to policyholders and efficient management.

B., ILLINOIS. The Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of America, under its present management, is gradually working into a strong commercial position, and we believe is destined to become a profitable enterprise. Had it not been for the questionable methods of selling the stock the company would long ago, we believe, have achieved a substantial success. The Wall Street stock sellers that fattened their pocketbooks at the expense of the former stockholders were responsible to a large degree for the long delay in the realization of profits. From now on, we look for clearer skies for American Marconi, although in no sense do we regard the stock as a conservative investment.

C., MICHIGAN. The National Grocery Company was incorporated September 29, 1904, in Michigan to carry on a wholesale grocery business. The company owns and operates business houses in thirteen cities in Michigan and two outside the State. The preferred stock has been paid dividends regularly semi-annually at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and 2 per cent. per annum has been paid on the common stock since organization. On February 26, 1912, a special dividend of 3 per cent. was paid to the common stockholders. For the fiscal year of 1912 the company made a slight advance over 1911. We do not have the 1913 report. We consider the stock an investment for a business man.

C. C. T., MICHIGAN. You state that you have invested $1,000 per annum for five years in the Citizen's Telephone Company (Grand Rapids, Mich.) stock at the average price of 97, and you are now considering picking up more of the stock since its slump to $80 per share. You ask if we consider this advisable in face of the fact that the dividend has been reduced from 8 per cent to 6 per cent. We do not believe that it is ever wise to concentrate money in one investment security. We do not believe that you would be justified in buying more of this stock. Indeed, while we always hesitate to advise CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to sell an investment at a loss, it is our opinion that we should elect to take our loss on a portion of our holdings and put the money into a more stable security.

MISS C., NEW MEXICO. Shares of the A. T. and S. F. Ry., and B. & O. R. R., may be purchased through any New York stock exchange firm, the brokerage commission being one-eighth of one per cent. We think you make a mistake in quoting us. I doubt that we ever recommended B. & O. stock for a woman's investment. We have recently suggested B. & O. 4½ per cent. convertible bonds, which we believe quite attractive. They are now selling at around 91⅜, at which figure they return on the direct investment about 4⅞ per cent. and yield about 5.15 per cent. B. & O. stock is selling at this writing at around 91¾. The stock pays 6 per cent. and at the current price returns about 6.50. We prefer Atchison to B. & O. It is selling at about the same price and also pays 6 per cent. The company's statement, which was issued recently, shows that an amount equivalent to 8.90 per cent. on the common stock was earned for the fiscal year ended June 30.

S., NEW YORK. You ask us to direct you to some trust or surety company where a person may place two or three thousand dollars at 5 per cent. interest for the benefit of his wife during her term of life and the principal go to a brother or sister at the wife's death. You want absolute safety in your investment. We do not know of any surety or trust company in the State of New York that would undertake such a trust and pay 5 per cent. for the use of the money. You should invest the money in bonds which are legal for savings and trust funds in the State of New York. The safest bonds for a trust fund such as you desire to create, in our opinion, are the high-class municipal issues. Perhaps New York City issues stand highest. One of the most attractive New York City issues are the 1960 4½s which are selling at 100 and the 1959 4s which are selling at 96⅝. You may secure bonds of the smaller cities, such as Albany, Syracuse and Utica, that will yield at present prices slightly more than the New York City bonds, and these are also non-taxable and are legal investment for trust funds. You can devise in the form of a will any disposition of your estate you desire, your wife, if she survives you, to have life use of the income from the personal property.

A., MAINE. To comply with your request for a complete explanation of the federal income tax law would be impracticable. You would do well to secure a copy of the law from a banking firm. Make out your own interpretation of it, which you can easily do, as the text of the law seems plain. Briefly the sixteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, proclaimed in February, 1913, provides: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration." The tax affects all citizens of the United States, resident or non-resident, resident aliens as to all income, and non-resident aliens as to the income derived from property owned or business carried on in the United States, and affects people with income of $3,000 and over, if single; and $4,000 and over, if the taxable person is married and living with husband or wife. The normal tax is one per cent. of the annual income, and a tax in addition to the normal tax on incomes in excess of $20,000, as follows:

$20,001 to $50,000, one per cent. additional.
$50,001 to $75,000, two per cent. additional.
$75,001 to $100,000, three per cent. additional.
$100,001 to $250,000, four per cent. additional.
$250,001 to $500,000, five per cent. additional.
$500,000 and over, six per cent. additional.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

The Christian's Rewards*

A REWARD is a very pleasant thing to think about. But some of our thinking about the rewards of Christian service has been a little crude and shallow. We are studying in this lesson about the "Ideal Christian." We have had, during the year, eleven studies about him, and this is the twelfth. In what way does the ideal Christian think about the rewards of his service?

You remember that when Enid asked Geraint what guerdon he desired in return for the service he had done, he answered:

"None, for the deed's sake have I done the deed."

There are many different standards for computing values and rewards. The lowest of all is money. A certain work is done and the rewards or wages come in the shape of money. This money can be turned into nourishment, protection and pleasure for the one who has earned it and for his friends. But the money itself is the lowest form of reward. Then there are all sorts of prizes that may come, liberties, pleasures, possessions, influence, fame. All these things have a rating in the table of rewards.

But then there are other kinds of figures on this reward table. You make another person happy. How much is that worth? How many dollars does it take to equal that? If it is some one you love, do you want any other reward than the knowledge that you have made the loved one glad?

The essence of the truth about Christian reward lies in that. Kind words, kind deeds, the bringing of sunshine into other lives, these are the dollars and the jewels of the heavenly kingdom. You do a kindness for some one and the fact of that kindness stands for you as an eternal reward.

Kind words can never die.

That is literally true. Nothing can alter the fact that you said them. You may forget, but the record stands. Nothing can alter the fact that on such and such a day, at such and such an hour, you brought cheer to a human soul.

This principle becomes still more thrilling when it is applied to the great task of soul-winning. What is the reward for winning a soul? Could there possibly be any higher reward than the simple fact that a soul has been won? It is a reward that will grow and grow. Every new development of that soul, every other soul that he wins, will be added to that original treasure you secured for yourself when a soul was born again because of you.

But there is something more after all. Not only will you find in heaven the record of the kind words and deeds and the cheered and saved souls, but you will find still greater powers for going on with the work you began on earth. The powers you have used for the King here will have been strengthened by all their earthly exercise and will be infinitely increased in the new body and enlightened mind that will be yours in the new life. The reward for good work will be the power to do more and better work.

The other line of Geraint's reply suggests still another reward, perhaps the highest of all.

In uttermost obedience to the King.

We were thinking a moment ago about the blessing we can bring to others by our work. We must not forget the joy we bring to the Saviour by faithful service. That seems a high thought, but it is true. We know he is grieved by our failures and our sins. Are we not equally sure that he is pleased by our service and our triumphs? If we truly love him, we shall care more about pleasing him than about anything else in the world and can have no higher reward than knowing that we have pleased him. That will be our aim—to do our service in "uttermost obedience to the King."

We love him now, but we shall love him more in heaven. And in our very increased love for him there will be richest reward. In fellowship with him and in fellowship with his friends we shall find high delight. Reward means joy. The New Testament writers piled adjective upon adjective, noun upon noun in trying to express their conception of the rewards of the faithful Christian. Paul speaks of a "weight of glory." Light, love, glory, joy—these things are awaiting us if we are faithful unto death.

A Plan for My Life*

TO ASK this question is to answer it. Has God a plan for my life? Of course he has. God has a tremendous plan of his own which he is working out throughout the universe. In that plan every soul has a place. He is counting on you to do something. He had something definitely in mind for you when your life began. There is a place in his plan for the person who hears your name, who looks like you, who is working where you work. Are you filling the place, carrying out the plan?

Paul has an earnest word to say to one of his friends, at the end of the letter to the Colossians: "Say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it." Substitute your name there, for the name of Archippus and then—take heed!

But, after all, the chief message of this lesson is one of comfort. God has a plan for your life, so don't be anxious about it. Trust him. All he wants is willingness to let him have his way and trust that he will have and is having it. Read the beautiful Scripture references. See how God, again and again, assures people, his nation, King Cyrus, Saul and Barnabas, Peter and John, that he has a work for them and will take the responsibility of making them successful. Guidance will be plain, success is assured so long as we keep in touch with him.

Remember that it is not only big people, doing prominent work, whom God promises to lead to success. Even a little task is important if it is the task God sets you at. Indeed, it is not little if it is his assignment. All work is dignified when it is done for God. Be faithful in that, and either the small task will be importantly linked to a great work, or a greater work will be given you yourself to do.

* "HAS GOD A PLAN FOR MY LIFE?" Isa. 43: 1; Jer. 29: 11; Isa. 45: 1-5; Acts 9: 15; 13: 2; Matt. 4: 19. Epworth League Topic for Sunday, December 7, 1913.

SHE REMEMBERED LINCOLN

I have read The Portrait Life of Lincoln, and cannot tell you how much I enjoyed it. It took me back fifty years. We then lived in Albany, N. Y. The city was ablaze with flags and bunting, ready for the reception of President Lincoln. He was taken in an open barouche with the governor and mayor through the principal streets to the capitol. I saw him face to face, his tall hat in his hand.

Next time it was in a city draped in mourning. He lay in state at the capitol. Colonel William Young of the Eighteenth New York, who was bodyguard, took my husband and self at 2 A.M. to take the last look upon him we so loved as our President.

Next, a young engineer, P. M. Arthur, had the honor of taking his remains to Springfield, Ill. He afterward became grand chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

A wonderful man, raised up to do a most wonderful work.

CHRISTIAN MARTYRS GIVEN TO THE LIONS

CHRISTIANITY is the greatest fact in history. The early Christians endured martyrdom rather than forsake Principle. The picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, depicts 87,000 people assembled in the Coliseum at Rome to witness the Christians given to the lions. In such a scene may be read the inevitable doom of the Empire that ruled the world. The blood of the martyrs is the seed from which Christian civilization sprang. If you would know the history of mankind—every sacrifice for principle, every struggle for liberty, every conflict and every achievement, from the dawn of civilization down to the present time—then embrace this splendid opportunity to place in your home the world-famed publication,

Ridpath's History of the World

CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS are offered ONE MORE OPPORTUNITY to place this splendid History in their homes. We will mail our beautiful 48-page free booklet of SAMPLE PAGES to all who are interested in our offer, and without any obligation on your part to buy. A coupon for your convenience is printed in the corner of this advertisement. The sets are Brand New, brought right down to date, beautifully bound in Half Morocco, and must be sold immediately. We offer the few remaining sets

At LESS than even damaged sets were ever sold!

We will name our price only in direct letters to those sending the coupon below. Tear off the coupon, write name and address plainly and mail now before you forget it. Dr. Ridpath's widow derives her income from his History, and to print our price broadcast for the sake of more quickly selling these few sets would cause great injury to future sales. Send coupon to-day.

The Christian Herald says: "Ridpath's History of the World may be regarded as a complete library in itself. No other work of its kind has ever supplied a history so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men. We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent Hand, guiding and developing all things. Wherever this history is read it cannot fail to have a powerful influence, not simply educational, but moral and spiritual as well. The History of the World has been warmly commended by our leading college professors, preachers and teachers, and by thousands of those who are foremost in all that makes for human progress and enlightenment. We cannot commend it too highly as a work that deserves a place in every American home."

VOL. IX THE CLOSE OF THE NINETEENTH AND DAWN OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

Nine Beautiful Royal Octavo Volumes

FREE!

WE will mail free a beautiful 46-page booklet on history to every reader interested in our offer who mails us the coupon below. It contains portraits of Socrates, Cæsar, Napoleon, Shakespeare and other great characters in history; also specimen pages showing the beautiful style in which the work is written.

4000 double column pages 2000 superb illustrations

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylonia's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendor; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written.

RIDPATH throws the mantle of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym for savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there—gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century—the most colossal world-figure of his time!

THE BEAUTIFUL SPECIMEN PAGES ARE FREE!

DR. Ridpath gives the history of every religion of mankind, and shows the slow but sure progress that has been made from Paganism to Christianity, from darkness to light. The customs and habits of people, the development of their science and literature and art, the growth of religion and education form a very vital part of this history, and that which gives the work its lasting popularity is the wonderfully beautiful and fascinating style in which it is written. To read this work is not only to increase one's fund of knowledge, but to improve the literary style in which we write or speak, and to expand and develop the mental powers.

EVERY American citizen should know the history of his own country and of the world to intelligently perform his full duty as a citizen in the government of this Nation. How else are we to judge of the great national questions that crowd upon us for decision except by some knowledge of the past? For the answer read the history of Mighty Babylon, or of imperial Rome as a kingdom, then as a republic, and finally as an empire, and familiarize yourself with her growth, development and decay. Then, when you know the cause of the rise and downfall of empires and nations, you will be able to intelligently discuss and decide the great questions that are pressing everywhere for attention.

GENUINE hand-made lace is becoming very rare. Travelers who pass through the countries famous for lace-making find but few places where machines of some kind are not used.

Therefore if you are fortunate enough to own some beautiful pieces you should not fail to give them the special care which will preserve them to you for the years to come.

That, as you know, means painstaking washing with Ivory Soap. For Ivory is so mild and pure that it cleanses the most delicate hand-work without harming a single thread.

Go where you will, you will find that the people who know lace also know Ivory Soap, a statement which is proven by the following directions received from one of the famous lace makers of St. Gall in far-off Switzerland.

To Wash Delicate Laces and Embroideries

Shave half of a small cake of Ivory Soap into a half-gallon glass jar. Fill jar half full of boiling water, screw on lid and shake until soap is dissolved.

First soak the lace or embroidery in clear, cold water for a few minutes to keep the dirt from setting, then put in the jar and shake until clean.

If a colored lace, remove and rinse in three clear waters. If white, set the jar on a piece of wood in a kettle half full of boiling water and boil for fifteen minutes. After boiling, remove lace and rinse in two clear waters and then in blue water.

Lay lace flat between Turkish towels and remove moisture by patting. Then shape and pin to a clean cloth on an ironing board to dry. Do not iron.

WHERE THE WHITE HOUSE HOLIDAY DINNER WILL BE EATEN

THE "EAST ROOM", SCENE OF THE WHITE HOUSE WEDDING

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

TWO HOLIDAYS AND A WEDDING

NECKLACE AND PENDANT GIFT

WHAT with weighty affairs of state lasting far into the holidays, and with a White House wedding adding to the joys of the Thanksgiving season, the historic Executive Mansion has rarely witnessed a more eventful year, politically or socially, than the present. President Wilson and his family have been looking forward with no little interest to their first Christmas in the White House. There have been occasions in the history of the nation when Chief Magistrates have been obliged to alter, at the last moment, all their holiday plans, but the present incumbent of the White House has allowed for no such contingency. He has made his arrangements to spend the Yuletide "at home" and to celebrate in a way that will fulfil the traditions of the rousing, old-fashioned American Christmas.

The Wilsons are strong in family feeling, and they delight to entertain their relatives—so much so that they have had, since coming to Washington, an uninterrupted succession of house guests recruited from their kith and kin. As for juveniles to foster the Christmas spirit, though there are no young children in the immediate family of the President, there will be no dearth of young folks at any Christmas gathering at the Executive Mansion during the present administration. "White House babies" is the designation which has been bestowed upon some of these juniors, not less because of the ties of blood which bind them to the President than by reason of the frequency of their visits. Another influence that will go to shape the destiny of the Wilson Christmas in the White House is found in the circumstance that the President is a Southerner by birth, and his family is, to a considerable extent, Southern in ideals and sympathies. Christmas has a deep significance in the South as an occasion of mirth and merrymaking, and something of the Yuletide spirit of Dixie may be anticipated in the White House celebration. By temperament and training the President is well qualified to make the most of the principal holiday of the year. He is very fond of simple pleasures, and his long collegiate experience has accustomed him to regard the Christmas holidays as a respite when arduous duties may be temporarily laid aside. Since it is the custom of Congress to adjourn before Christmas until a date following New Year's, there should be nothing to interfere with Mr. Wilson's continuance of this policy in his present position.

The Wilsons plan to have Christmas dinner served in the evening—the usual time for dinner at the White House. If there are many guests, the table will extend the full length of the private or family dining-room—that cozy apartment at the northwest corner of the Mansion which, in its white woodwork and mahogany furniture, is suggestive of an old Virginia manor house. Mrs. Wilson has not elected thus far to exercise the privilege vouchsafed to each successive mistress of the White House to order a new china service, and consequently the Christmas repast will be served on the gold and white china which was selected by Mrs. Roosevelt and which constitutes to-day the mainstay in presidential tableware, there remaining in the White House china closets only remnants of the dinner services made to the order of Mrs. Hayes, Mrs. Grant, Mrs. Lincoln and other bygone first ladies of the land.

Since coming to the White House, the President has shown his preference for a comparatively simple table. He finds more satisfaction in a substantial American dinner, consisting of a soup, a meat course, salad and dessert, than in an elaborate French menu, served in from seven to ten courses. But the traditional turkey and cranberry sauce will be there, and all the other standard Christmas dishes on this 25th of December. If the custom of four decades is adhered to, it will be a Rhode Island turkey that President Wilson will carve as he sits at the head of the table. Sentiment and tradition may have had something to do with the selection sometimes, but the main explanation lies in the fact that the chestnut-fed turkeys that have come to the White House from Rhode Island have been exceptionally fine specimens.

It has not been quite settled whether or not there will be a Christmas tree at the White House, but the chances are that there will, for the tree has come to be regarded as a Christmas institution during recent administrations. The Tafts chose the Blue Parlor as the best place for gift-laden evergreens; the Roosevelt trees

MISS JESSIE WOODROW WILSON, BRIDE MR. FRANCIS B. SAYRE, GROOM

TEMPERANCE WOMEN MEET

THE fortieth annual convention of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union, with nearly five hundred delegates from all parts of the country and a score of distinguished temperance workers from foreign countries, are unanimous in declaring the convention recently closed at Asbury Park, N. J., to have been the largest and best in its history.

The greatest single gain reported is the phenomenal victory at the polls last November, which made West Virginia the ninth prohibition State. The unprecedented majority of over 92,000 for State-wide prohibition in the "Little Mountain State" is an expression of public opinion which will be felt far beyond its borders.

On the third night the Casino, in which the convention was held, was crowded to the doors to listen to the address of the Rev. W. L. Pickard, D.D., of Georgia, who spoke on "The Destruction of the Great Dragon." One of the most forceful and eloquent speakers on the program was Mrs. Randolph Clarkson, a prominent British temperance worker. She referred proudly to the fact that the president of the British Association is also president of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union. She is Rosalind, Countess of Carlisle, who is represented here by Lady Aurea Howard, her second daughter. Mrs. Clarkson was for five years general secretary of the "Y" work in her country. Of the 170,000 members, 12,000 are young women between the ages of fourteen and twenty-five.

Michigan won a silk flag for the largest increase in number and grade of medal contests. A gold medal was presented to Mrs. Anna M. Hays of Cass City, Mich., for the largest amount of personal work done. In the flower mission department the first prize went to Kansas, the second to Kentucky, and the third to New York.

Thursday, January 15, was designated as a day of fasting and prayer. Election of officers was conducted on Tuesday. Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens of Portland, Me., was again chosen president, the office she has held since 1898, succeeding the late Frances E. Willard. She reappointed as vice-president at large Miss Anna A. Gordon of Evanston, Ill. Other national officers were re-elected as follows: Mrs. Frances P. Parks, Evanston, Ill., corresponding secretary; Mrs. Elizabeth Preston Anderson, Johnstown, N. D., recording secretary; Mrs. Elizabeth P. Hutchinson, Evanston, Ill., treasurer; Mrs. Sarah H. Hoge, Lincoln, Va., was reappointed assistant recording secretary.

On November 4 a jubilee program was pr sented. States that had gained in membersh were brought to the front. State songs inte spersed the program at frequent intervals. Met ods of increasing membership were explained.

Daniel A. Poling, secretary of the Chamber Commerce of Indianapolis, national superintende of temperance and Christian citizenship of th United Society of Christian Endeavor, made forceful and inspiring address on the last evenin November 5. He was followed by Mrs. Mar Harris Armor, affectionately termed by her ass ciates in the temperance cause "the Georg Cyclone," who spoke no less inspiringly on th subject of "A Saloonless Nation in 1920." Whe she had finished her speech but not her speakin Mrs. Armor started in with her usual whirlwin fashion and secured subscriptions to the support o the prohibition campaign, totaling $3,900.

Formal adjournment was taken on motion o Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp of Kentucky. Afte Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens had let fall her gavel the foreign visitors came down to the platform hands were joined throughout the audience, and th convention was closed with the singing of "God b with you till we meet again."

TWO HOLIDAYS AND A WEDDING

were placed in the room directly under the Blue Room, which is used as the diplomats' retiring room at state social functions; and in former years other trees have spread their branches, decked with candles or tiny electric lamps, in the private apartments of the presidential family on the second floor of the Mansion.

Here, on the upper floor of the White House, take place the more intimate features of the Christmas celebration, such as the exchange of presents. When Mrs. Hayes was mistress of the White House, she invited all the employees of the Executive establishment and their families to a big party held on the second floor of the house; but that was in the days when the presidential business offices occupied space on the second floor, and since the reconstruction of the White House some years ago, all the accommodations above stairs have been reserved as a place where the presidential family may find seclusion, and this idea is preserved even at Christmas time.

Although President Wilson has announced very clearly that he will not receive presents of any value from strangers, he will, no doubt, be the recipient of many gifts at Christmas time which cannot very well be avoided. This has been the experience of every man who has held the presidential office. These come from friends in all sections of the country. If it is only the valuable presents which President Wilson feels constrained to return, most of the Christmas remembrances will be retained, as the majority take the form of inexpensive presents. In any event, each donor will receive a note of thanks from the President's secretary.

Of late years it has been the custom of the Chief Executive to remember with a gift at Christmas time every person connected with the White House establishment. What this means will be better appreciated when it is explained that there are upwards of fifty persons on the staff at the Executive offices. If President Wilson follows the custom of his two predecessors, he will present a turkey to each married man and a five-dollar gold piece to each unmarried employee, accompanying the gift with a little engraved card expressing the President's good wishes.

ticipation goes through that unique American colony whose residents have no vote, the District of Columbia, reaches its borders, spreads out over the whole land, leaps the oceans and touches the very outskirts of civilization. Foreign potentates smile pleasantly at the new opportunity to show friendship for America in a graceful way, and bestir themselves to seek out fitting gifts. Americans abroad have a new home topic to enliven their exile. Congress, the Supreme Court, army and navy officers, the diplomatic corps, governmental departments, all welcome the event as a suitable occasion for expressing a human interest in the White House family that cannot in good taste be shown in the routine of Washington life. And in the homes of the land, the preparations up to the very moment of the ceremony are watched with a sympathy that proclaims the oneness of the American people. The secret of the popularity of White House weddings is in the fact that they strip the serious mansion of its official character for the time being, and reveal it in its true nature as the first home of the land.

The engagement of Miss Jessie Woodrow Wilson and Mr. Francis B. Sayre created this delightful stir for the first time since the wedding of Miss Roosevelt. As the day drew near, the subject crowded out all other topics. The dignified Senate presented the bride—she was a bride to the public from the day of the announcement—with a stately silver service of fifteen pieces. The other branch of Congress, the House of American Fathers, wisely selected a diamond necklace and pendant, the latter a large canary diamond surrounded by eighty-four blue white stones of great beauty. Boxes piled up in the wide halls, and glittering gifts covered every available receptacle. Teas and luncheons interfered with the corps of modistes, but the women young and old of the land read every word of the press description of the wonderful wedding gown too precious to be entrusted to the express company, and so sent by special messenger from New York. The doors were removed, almost, to admit the one hundred and thirty-five pound cake, two and a half feet high and nearly two feet across, containing the ingredients of two thousand lucky dreams. (Countless tiny boxes filled the mails accompanied by wistful petitions for bits of that wondrous creation.) A forest of gift flowers, many of them in beautiful silver holders, hid floors and walls.

BUILDING THE ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIVE POUND WEDDING CAKE

It is a picture to thrill the heart of every American girl. Miss Wilson had become a very popular addition to Washington life. Her marriage to Mr. Sayre was looked forward to as essentially a home function. The hour was fixed at half past four on Nov. 25, and the East Room was selected for the ceremony. Some of the White House brides were married in the Blue Room, and that was the scene of Mr. Cleveland's marriage to Miss Frances Folsom in 1886, the only wedding of a President in the White House thus far. Miss Wilson selected as her bridesmaids her sisters, Miss Margaret and Miss Eleanor Wilson, Miss Adelaide Mitchell Scott, of Princeton; Miss Mary G. White, of Baltimore; and Miss Marjorie Brown, of Atlanta, Ga. Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, of Labrador fame, and Mr. Charles E. Hughes, Jr., son of Associate Justice Hughes, were named early as Mr. Sayre's attendants. The Rev. Sylvester W. Beach, of Princeton, was selected to perform the ceremony.

A limited number of the intimate friends of the Wilson family were invited as guests at the wedding, besides representatives of various departments of the government with their families. For the event itself the magnificent East Room was practically free from special adornment other than a few palms and standards of choice flowers. It is reported that Mr. Sayre, who was a lawyer on the staff of District Attorney Whitman of New York, will become secretary to the president of Williams College (Mass.), his alma mater. The friendliest good wishes of the whole nation have been sincerely directed toward the happy bride and groom from the start.

It has been pointed out that the wedding of Miss Wilson and Mr. Sayre must be spoken of as the eleventh "White House wedding," and not the thirteenth, as has been supposed. Two weddings commonly understood to have taken place in the Executive Mansion were really performed elsewhere in the capital.

The White House Wedding

PRESIDENT and Miss Jessie Woodrow Wilson have shared the interested attention of the public for many weeks, but it is safe to say that the greater interest centered in Miss Wilson. Announcement of an approaching wedding in the White House has an effect all its own. Official and social Washington at once began to readjust their engagements. A new respect and affection are felt for the occupants of the staid old residence of our chief magistrate. An ever-widening thrill of pleasurable an-

$12,000 A MINUTE FOR EFFICIENCY

THE heart of the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. movement in this country beats in New York. Every effort, every high resolution, every achievement here goes pulsing outward until every one of the thirty-three hundred branches to the remotest and humblest feels an impulse and a hope toward better things. To keep the work in New York at the top notch of efficiency means, therefore, a corresponding effect throughout the whole great system, and even abroad. To lower the standard even for a day would mean dismay in a joint national organization of 500,000 members.

So it was a matter of some moment when the two executive boards in New York sat down to consider the following imperative requirements, minus the funds to meet them:

For the Young Woman's work; a typical Association building to accommodate social, educational, physical and religious needs of young women in crowded sections above Twenty-third Street on the East Side, to cost $600,000, and to be known as the Central Branch; a similar building in Harlem, where work is growing rapidly, to cost $500,000; a second building in the upper East Side to be used as a lodging and boarding house by young women, to cost $350,000; a well-equipped building to serve as a club house and home for nurses, with Association surroundings—one of the greatest needs in this city—to cost $400,000; enlargement of the present Y. W. C. A. building on the West Side, $50,000; to assist the Colored Women's Branch in providing better quarters, $100,000; headquarters for the National Board of Y. W. C. A., including quarters and equipment for a training school for secretaries, to cost $800,000; general expenses and equipment, $200,000. Total, $3,000,000.

The Young Men's work called for an expenditure of $390,000 upon its Bowery Branch; $360,000 through the Union Branch; and $150,000 upon the Colored Men's work; and $100,000 upon other branches and for general purposes. Total, another million, and three plus one equals four, whether you say matches or millions.

ONE OF THE FOURTEEN-DAY CLOCKS

Finally—of course this is not a verbatim narrative—Mr. C. S. Ward, who is credited with having raised over $20,000,000 for Y. M. C. A. work in eighty-four campaigns, said: "Oh, let's take a couple of weeks off from work and count four million dollars out of New York's pockets."

"Impossible," said some one, thoughtlessly.

"How so?" asked Mr. Ward, in mild surprise. "You forget that Philadelphia in a similar campaign gave its Association $1,050,000; Cleveland gave $540,000; Erie, Pa., gave $200,000 into the work there; Boston, $515,000; Chicago, $1,200,000; Toronto, $658,000; and I don't know how many more examples I might name if you gave me time. Why, those sums are far greater in proportion to the resources of the cities than this amount we are going to accept from New York. Four million dollars is very little for New York to give to this necessary work.

So the plans were laid for the latest and most striking money-raising campaign for Christian work yet witnessed on this continent. The campaign committee consisted of 1,000 picked workers, who were grouped in teams of ten with a chairman each. Twenty thousand names of persons reputed to be liberal givers to worthy causes were distributed among these canvassers. Exact methods of work were adopted and scant attention was given to uncertain "leads." The financial district was to be thoroughly gone over, and the big business houses. Business more than any other interest is directly benefited by the kind of work done by these organizations, and therefore Business was to be asked to foot the bills.

At a rally of the leaders on the evening preceding the first day of active work, announcement was made of advance subscriptions, totaling $1,986,346, mostly conditional upon the full amount being raised. Tuesday morning, November 11, the two weeks' campaign was inaugurated with a universal minute of prayer observed throughout the Association world at nine o'clock, New York time. To bring that impressive feature to pass required an avalanche of mail and telegrams. Three immense clocks, such as have been made familiar in many cities by similar campaigns, were placed at strategic points. The press reported the movement with enthusiasm from the start. Business institutions devised ways and means to advance the cause. The five great express companies displayed signs on all their wagons. A popular department store devoted a large window to an "exhibit" composed of young women representing the work done by the Young Women's Christian Association. Street car lines displayed notices, and moving picture houses threw reports upon their screens. Ministers preached upon the subject; and the public, especially the financial portion of it, did what was expected of it.

But women, efficiency and the luncheons won the campaign. Dr. M. L. Burton, former president of Smith College, prophesied success because earnest-minded women found this cause worthy. At the preliminary rally, Mr. George W. Perkins, chairman of the campaign, said:

"The unprecedented extension and development of the work in the last ten years, not only in this country but abroad, is traceable directly to its efficiency in ministering to the practical everyday needs of young men and young women. It enters into their lives with a Christian spirit, and it is with them seven days in the week. And the object of this campaign is to erect a number of buildings throughout this city whose doors shall be open day and night."

And a veteran campaigner declared that without the face-to-face meeting of the workers every noon, with the enthusiastic rapid-fire reports of progress from each eager group to stir emulation, and the inspiring speeches by leaders, the campaign could not have been carried through. Those meetings supplied the essential esprit de corps.

This was admittedly an appeal to the prosperous. Large subscriptions were chiefly sought, and names of men and women familiar to the public for their wealth and benevolences constantly appeared in the daily reports as large subscribers to the fund, and, in many cases, enthusiastic workers.

"A CHILD IS BORN!"

BY FRANCES BEATRICE TAYLOR

I heard the angels, shining white,
Go singing, singing over me.
"A King," I said, "is born to-night,
They keep such revelry."

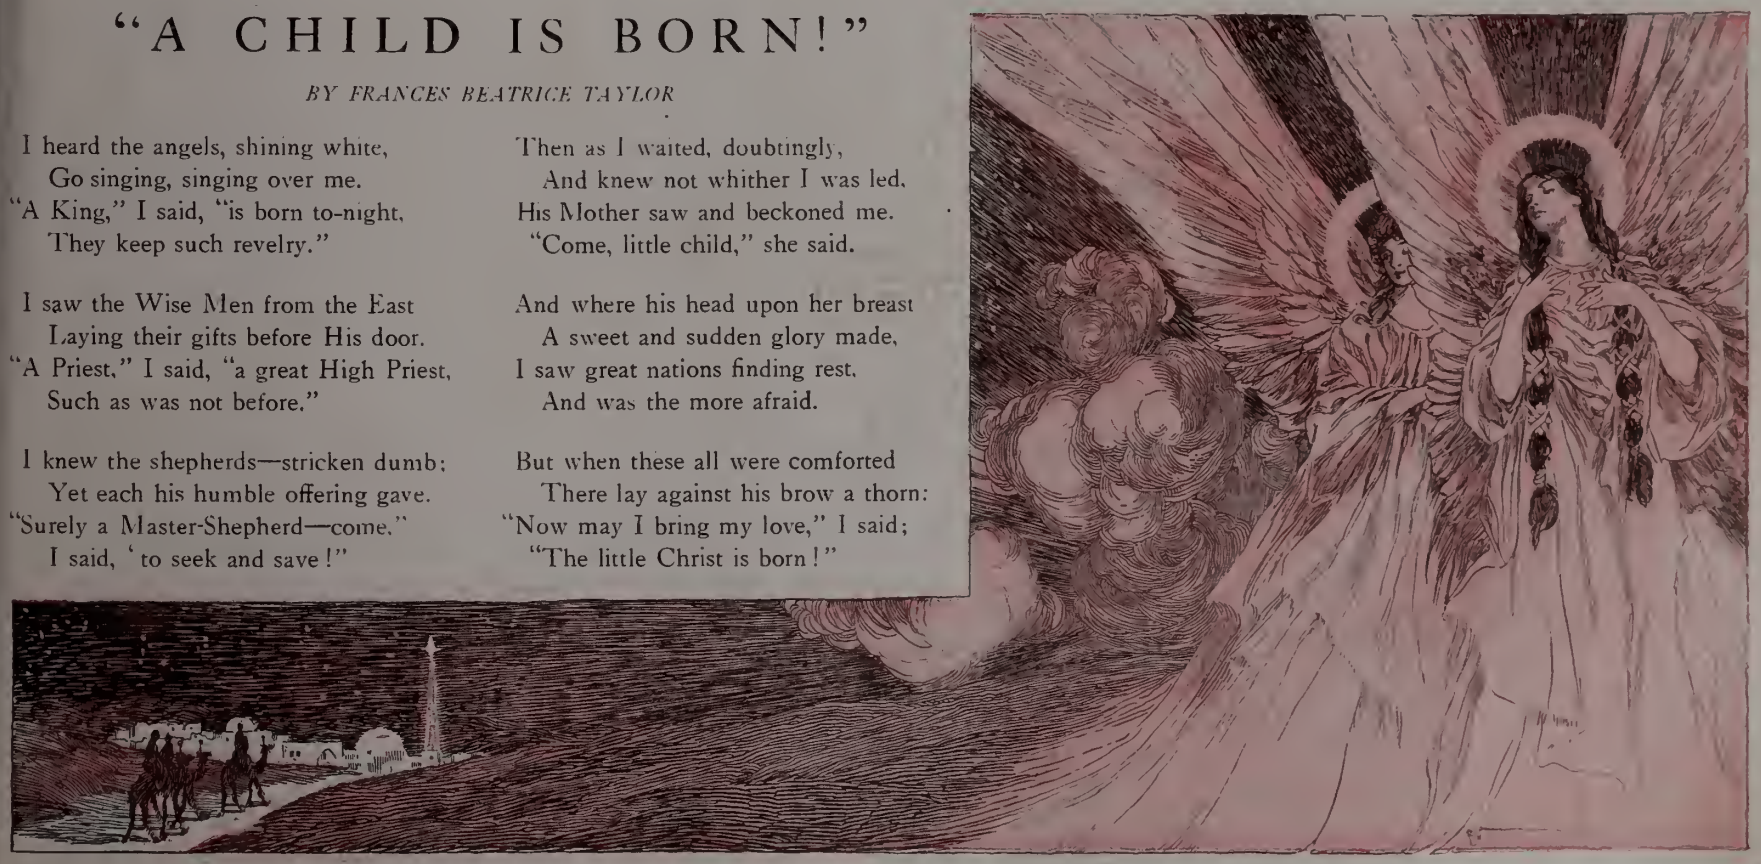
I saw the Wise Men from the East
Laying their gifts before His door.
"A Priest," I said, "a great High Priest,
Such as was not before."

I knew the shepherds—stricken dumb;
Yet each his humble offering gave.
"Surely a Master-Shepherd—come,"
I said, 'to seek and save!"

Then as I waited, doubtingly,
And knew not whither I was led,
His Mother saw and beckoned me.
"Come, little child," she said.

And where his head upon her breast
A sweet and sudden glory made,
I saw great nations finding rest,
And was the more afraid.

But when these all were comforted
There lay against his brow a thorn:
"Now may I bring my love," I said;
"The little Christ is born!"



THE CHURCH WITHOUT GOD

A Christmas Sermon By Pastor Charles Wagner*

TEXT: "Because there was no room for them in the inn." Luke 2: 7

CHRIST has told us that the kingdom of God does not come by external manifestations. We need reminding of this occasionally. Accustomed as we are to considering the facts of history, not in their plain simplicity, but in a flood of light blended of all the fires of dream and legend, with all the embellishments of later events, we are in danger of acquiring an appetite for spectacular stage settings, and of becoming incapable of appreciating facts which are not so adorned. We suffer such a deformation of judgment that we deserve classification, in the spiritual domain, with those who having eyes see not, and having ears hear not. All great things have humble beginnings. If you can, put out the fires for a time, that you may see better, just as the lights are turned off in a theater to give a better view of the stage.

Under the stars, one tranquil night, at a period when political events of historical interest are occurring, a small thing happens, a thing of no importance. A child is born. No one is interested in the child but his father and his mother, a poor family lodged in a stable. And we have this significant note: "There was no room for them in the inn!" And this is the detail to keep in mind. For it has symbolic significance. Ideas, at birth, must lie out in the open; they have no lodging, no gable on the street. They have no settled rights and privileges. They are suspected of vagabondage, since they have no papers and no known residence. Humanity is so organized that in the hostelry of contemporary society in every age, all necessary precautions are taken to prevent the free entrance of new ideas and new sentiments. Vigilant guards stop them at the threshold. It has always been so, and it will always be so.

A Religion Without God

Centuries have passed. The child who had for cradle only the manger of a stable became a man, the most influential man in history. There was no room for him in the inn. To-day he is proprietor not only of one inn, but of numberless branches all over the world. His grandeur is beyond admiration, his glory is more than royal. He has been set at the summit of an extraordinary hierarchy, the better to measure his loftiness, by marking the steps which must be climbed to reach him. He has been made so grand, so rich, so sumptuous, that the poor and lowly are not always able to recognize him. Do not think of others, my brethren, as I say this, not of churches with pompous exteriors; think of yourselves. The inns I am speaking of need not be magnificently adorned. They may be built entirely of concepts and dogmas. In certain theological systems, purely intellectual hostelries, the Christ is a supreme abstraction, arrived at through abstractions. Elsewhere, he may be neither a dogma nor a potentate with a kingdom solidly established in this world, a kingdom which fights and even slays, in order to live and guard its prestige; but he is God crowned with power, throned in such magnificence that all the purple and gold he displays are only a distant reflection of his majesty. God made himself a man; man has made him God again; he came to us, but we have pushed him far away from us again.

Let us come back once more to the night at Bethlehem, to the manger, to the Child in which God visited our poverty. Let us come back to Jesus of Nazareth in his simplicity, his love, his thirst for mercy and sacrifice, to the man in whom God lived, and let us put this question: "In the marvelous inn which to-day bears his name, his form and his cross as a sign, would there be room for him?" I say for him, the true Christ, not for his image, pale copies or caricatures of him. It is a question that fills me with sadness and sorrow. We have been making a great deal of noise about what men have called in anger and contempt the godless school. [Alludes to the secularization of the schools in France.—Translator.] But how much more terrible a contrast, what a terrible judgment would we condense in a formula, if we were obliged to confess that there might be a godless church, a religion without God!

Let us not be disturbed by the strange and paradoxical form of the phrase. Let us face the realities squarely; God is a reality, the supreme reality. Is it not possible for us to retain of this reality only the appearance in our cults and our life, if we are not extremely careful? Long ago, the prophet said: "This people honor me with their lips, but their heart is far from me." And if the heart is far from God, does it not follow inevitably that the very names by which we denominate him become only empty shells? Sacred formulas, traditions, rites perpetuated by custom, grown empty of all substance. The same words are spoken, the same motions are made as when these forms were fragrant with spirit and warm with life; but at bottom, the later generation is worshiping only a strange idol which suffers their mediocrities and their injustice in silence.

Let us examine our consciences, with the melancholy and suggestive little phrase for our guide, "There was no room for them." Might there be an organized church or an individual religion in which there was no place for God? And how would this monstrous condition be recognized? Ah! it is very simple, terribly simple and clear.

At the inn in Bethlehem there was no room for them. Why? Because the poor couple from Nazareth had no money, or at least had not enough to pay for expensive rooms. Does it not sometimes happen that if you have no money, there is no church for you? Such cases exist not only where religion, with its ministering officers, its institutions, its means of grace, constitutes a sort of expensive merchandise, but in every place where the humble are disregarded and looked down upon. For the poor may be looked down upon, even in a religion which has only bare walls for a setting. The subtlest pride is that which assumes an exterior of humility. Worldly pride and spiritual pride are the pests of religious associations. They may exist even with appearances of the largest charity. Some have never understood that we are all brethren in God. They admit it in theory; in practice, they turn their backs upon it. The religion that has a place for God has a place for real fraternity. And a religion which neglects, despises, disdains the humble, is clearly one which has no room for him.

In the Open with God

We say, also, that God is a God of truth. He loves honest hearts, sincere words, which neither go beyond nor lag behind convictions and sentiments. And he appreciates especially that religious manifestation which is a loyal translation of the condition within. It is for this reason that wherever his Spirit is, there must be respect for consciences, care for each one's dignity, liberty, integrity of soul.

But if you pass your level over hearts and your roller over thoughts; if the man who does not think in accordance with your conventional formulas is treated as a pariah; if you shut out the Master in the person of those disciples of his who understand differently from you, then liberty is banished, spontaneous faith is excommunicated; constraint and exterior convention replace inspiration, factitious unity replaces fundamental unanimity. And where is God? There is no room for him any longer.

The God of truth loves also, and above all others, the seekers, the pioneers, who are ready to make effort after effort to see a little more clearly into this marvelous and mysterious creation. He loves their spirit of sacrifice, their intrepid courage. At bottom it is he who supports and leads them, even if they do not give him a name. He loves them, because they thirst for light and equity and because they bravely risk their lives on unknown waves to discover new realities. There is no doubt that he mingles with their audacious company, shares their sufferings and their hopes, and lies with them on the hard earth, under the stars, while they seek distant countries and build the future city.

But if a church proclaims that she possesses the truth, and not only does not seek any longer but discourages those who seek, excludes the pioneers of the future from her bosom; if she barricades and seals herself in a narrow conservatism of interest and ideas, assuming to reduce the universe to the limits of what she happens to teach, what does she do with the God of limitless, overflowing, ever-renewed truth, the God whose will it is that man should move, should sanctify himself, should advance, should correct his work and repair the evil of centuries?

There is no room for such a God in this correct hostelry, which assumes to conduct and instruct every one and learn from no one. She insults and repels his friends and his servants, hence she repels God himself. Why, then, should it surprise any one that so many official establishments of religion have lost touch with the divine? God has moved out of them. He is not there; he is without, in the sweeping wind of the open, in the breath of the mountain, wherever brave men are struggling on paths not yet worn smooth.

Why a Church and a Religion

And you who are listening to me, you have caught the true religion, have you not, and that is why you have come here? What place does the manger of Bethlehem hold in your religion, the Gospel of simplicity, of poverty, of truth, which the shepherds proclaimed and the angels sang; what place does the essential hold in your heart?

You have pious books, religious habits and even religious thoughts, perhaps a system to explain the world. With all this, what do you do with the indispensable, the one thing needful, the spirit which trusts in God and keeps close to one's neighbor, which repents of evil and works in harmony with all reparation? Or are you rich in other things, poor only in God? Have you no eyes to see him when he passes?

Every day, all through the ages, God has been passing near us, unnamed. A stranger to the official demonstrations where his name is paraded, he prefers to go about unknown. It is true that he has ways of leading you to guess his presence, but you must open your eyes to recognize him. Be careful not to repel him when he presents himself to you in a form you have not seen before. The forms of the divine are as infinite as God himself; there are new manifestations at every moment, and often at points where no one would expect them.

At Bethlehem, where was a great crowd and much noise, nothing happened of more than ephemeral importance. It was in the shadow, in an unnoticed corner, that the Child marked with the sign of divinity was born in a stable. We may have great crowds and much noise about us, even hymns and prayers, and God may not be with us. Then, perhaps, in the solitude God walks at our side, and we have no suspicion that he is about us.

It often happens with God, with Christ, with the Gospel, as happens with love in certain families. At first there is great simplicity in the external evidences of the feeling; the gift of a flower, a kiss; and this is all that is needed, for the smallest sign, when it is genuine, has a great value. But hearts often grow cold, and gradually draw apart. A day comes when there is no love there any longer, and yet an effort is made to keep up its appearance. Now the demonstrations are multiplied; the bouquets grow more elaborate; there are gifts of jewels, a carriage, and, if finances permit, a mansion in the city, a fine country home.

But for the one of the two who remains faithful all this is deepest sadness, witness of nothingness, flowers on a tomb. That which happens thus to the most delicate sentiment of the human heart, on which depends our growth or decay, our life or death, happens also to the love of God. At the beginning of religious experience, by the very fact that you love, you have God in your hands, on your lips, in your eyes, in your heart. Words are rare, there is no ostentation, but the inner fire is strong, the thought of the true God is a torrent of living water which flows from men's hearts.

Let us come back to the hidden beauties! It is Christmas, the day of the Birth. At every anniversary the great question arises, Why have we come here? If you are not living so that it is worth your while to come, this day of the Birth is a day of sadness and discouragement for you.

May God give you grace to be severe with yourselves, and may he show you the things that are really worth while. May no one have cause to say of us, of our organization, of our personal religion, that these are handsome hostelries, but that God is not in them, because our hearts are far from him, because our lives are contrary to his will, and because in our houses, built of egoism, of disregard of our neighbor, of impurity and iniquity, there is no room for his Spirit.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, December 7. Luke 19: 1-10. "He is gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner." It was hurled as an accusation; it has been treasured as a garland. It was first said in contempt; it is repeated in adoration. It was thought to reveal his earthliness; it is now seen to unveil his glory. Our Saviour seeks the home of the sinner. The Best desires to be the guest of the worst. He spreads his kindnesses for the outcast, and he offers his friendship to the exile on the loneliest road. He waits to befriend the defeated, the poor folk with aching consciences and broken wills. He loves to go to souls that have lost their power of flight, like birds with broken wings, which can only flutter in the unclean road. He went to Zaccheus.

Yes, the Lord went to be "guest with a man that is a sinner," and he changed the sinner into a saint. The worldling found wings. The stone became flesh. Gentle emotions began to stir in a heart hardened by heedlessness and sin. Restitution took the place of greed. The home of the sinner became the temple of the Lord. "To-day is salvation come to this house forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham."

MONDAY, December 8. Joshua 7: 1-5. "They fled before the men of Ai." And the men in flight were the army of the Lord! What is wrong when presumably religious men are beaten? A church attacks a stronghold of iniquity, and is repulsed and retires discredited. What is there amiss? Or the individual is conquered in some stern moral battle, or in a time of panic he shows himself to be without resource. What is there wrong?

One thing is sure. The defeat is in no wise attributable to the faithlessness or forgetfulness of God. "He is faithful that promised." Defeat implies sin, the sin of deliberate wickedness, or the sin of imperfect consecration. A great surgeon once told me that one of his most delicate operations was spoilt by an unclean finger-nail of one of his nurses. A deadly enemy lauded in that uncleanness, and the forces of health were temporarily baffled and beaten. And so it is in still more delicate operations, in crusades against moral and spiritual disease: we can spoil the great Physician's work by our neglect and our uncleanness. A minister touched with malice, an elder poisoned with jealousy. a deacon soiled with greed; these can mar the work of a church and defeat its best crusades.

TUESDAY, December 9. Joshua 7: 6-15. "Israel hath sinned . . . Therefore they could not stand before their enemies." That is the most tragic commonplace in human life. Our sin leads us into disaster; we sin, and we cannot stand; our integrity is broken. And sometimes there is a darker disaster still; we are not conscious of the disaster! We are hypnotized by sin, and we think that defeat is triumph. We are like some poor fellow who thinks he is in perfect health, and he is already stricken with cancer. His moral strongholds are down, and yet he thinks himself invincible. The plague is in his soul, while he is boasting that he is immune.

Sin always affects our standing. Every sin weakens our powers of resistance. Every sin drains away some of our moral energy and consumes some of the fiber of the will. Sin is always wasteful, always hostile, and it inevitably leads us in the direction of moral bankruptcy. "The wicked shall not stand in the day of judgment"; in every critical season it shall be found that sin has withered and wasted their resources, and the enemy shall plant his banner on the field of the soul.

WEDNESDAY, December 10. Joshua 7: 16-26. Achan's disloyalty demoralized an army. One man's sin can poison a fellowship. "No man liveth to himself." One neglected garden can send its weed-seeds over a whole neighborhood. One man's uncleanness can introduce a plague into a nationality. So intimately are we interrelated. And who knows how wide and disastrous may be the influence of even a secret sin? What is secrecy in matters like these? Perhaps secrecy never means privacy, for it may be that the individual soul can never be detached from its fellows. There is "nothing done in secret that shall not be made manifest."

What a solemn and responsible thing it is to be alive! If each life were isolated our limits would be very small; but if all lives are interrelated, if there is a communion like unto the circulation of the blood, how awful the responsibility of inserting defilements which, like defilement in the blood, will course throughout the entire system! But the grace of God is sufficient even to these things. In his communion we can be kept pure and sweet, and by the energies of forgiveness our lost purity can be restored.

THURSDAY, December 11. Joshua 8: 1-8. "And the Lord said unto Joshua, Fear not!" That is like bird-song after a night of terrible storm. We have just been through troubled seasons of sin, and disaster, and judgment. Achan and his doings have clouded and shadowed everything. And now the sun is back again, and the birds are singing! God's favor is with us, and we hear the music of promise. The fight is to be renewed, Ai is again to be besieged, and this time defeat is to be changed into victory!

Thank God for the grace of the second chance! I had a friend who, in the days of his consecration, prayed that God would allow him to be tempted with all the temptations that had beaten him in the day of his alienation. He wanted to go on to old battlefields, and tear down the enemy's flag, and set up the flag of the Lord! It is a token of grace that God so often leads us again over desecrated ground, so that we may hallow it with the tears of our devotion. The Lord took Peter over his threefold denials that he might make a humble and tearful confession of his genuine love. "Thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee!"

FRIDAY, December 12. Joshua 8: 9-23. Here is a battle that is altogether superintended by the Lord. He is the Commander-in-Chief. His mind appoints the campaign; his will issues every decree. And the day ends with the shout of victory! The trouble often is that the Lord is only one of our officers; he is not in supreme command. We give him his turn; we do not give him our all. We give him Sunday, but not Monday. We give him the inch, we do not give him the mile. We give him the battle but not the campaign. He is only one of our council of war; he asks to be the only officer on the field! Everybody else must belong to the rank and file.

When God is supreme, victory is sure. The men and women who have overthrown strongholds of iniquity have been those who had no will but his. The God-possessed are certain of their goal. "To doubt would be disloyalty. To falter would be sin." All the resources of grace are with them, all the mighty panoply of all the ministries of light. Battles are privileges when we fight with God! The hard post is the privileged place, because in the home of difficulty we can best reveal the glory of the Lord.

SATURDAY, December 13. Acts 5: 1-11. Ananias "kept back part of the price." He made it appear as though he were giving all and he was only giving a part. And I, too, can keep back part of the price. I can bow before the Lord, in the attitude of prayer, as though I were offering him my all, and it is only a seeming offering, for I am keeping back my mind and soul. In my speech with my fellow men I can keep back part of the truth. I can offer an apparent courtesy, which in reality is packed with bitterness. I can "smile and smile, and be a villain."

It is holiness that the Lord seeks, allness, wholeness, everything stamped with his seal, and sharing in one great conservation. We must not hallow Sunday and keep back Monday. We must not consecrate a church and keep back the worship. We must not hallow God's name and then profane what other words we please. He seeks the completeness of the offering, all our life and all our estate, so that all "that is within us" and all that is without us may praise and bless his name.

MESSAGES FROM PRESENT-DAY POETS

IS THERE NOT ROOM?

LITTLE Lord Christ, stretching forth thy hands
To comfort a sad world's need,
Little Lord Christ in the swaddling bands,
Was there no room indeed
In Bethlehem's inn, on thy birthday night,
For the Prince of Peace, for the Lord of Light?

Come in love to us, Lord, once more.
Now at thy birthday feast,
Wide we will open each heart and door,
From the greatest unto the least.
In spite of our cares, our doubts, our sin,
We will bid thee welcome. Dear Lord, come in.

MAUD GOING.

THE BIRTH OF THE CHRIST

THE day's supernal dawning pales o'er the Holy City
And lights with prescient glory the lowly cattle-shed,
The Virgin Mother travails; the lowing beast doth marvel
To see the Infant Stranger usurp her straw-laid bed.

The morning star hath faded; the crimson dawning breaketh;
Edisto's wave is ruffled; the rabbi calls to prayer.
Now Bethlehem's rabble stirreth; the way-worn Magian neareth
The desert-pillowed cradle that bears Jehovah's Care.

By Bethlehem's lowly manger the Magi kneel together
And gaze with adoration upon the holy sign;
A joyous morning zephyr steals through the stable casement
And stirs the dewy lashes, with breath of tame-eyed kine.

The reign of darkness waneth; the beacon-moment lingers
To share the purer radiance that beameth from his hand;
A thrill of joy prophetic o'er Israel's valley stealeth;
A light from out heaven's glory hath beamed upon the land.

RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN.

COMPANIONSHIP

BECAUSE he seemed so helpless, lying there,
Looking so weak, so hopeless and forlorn,
When first I saw the wistful little stare
Of that wee cripple, knowing well the morn
Must pass to noon, and noon give place to night,
Bringing no promise of a better day—
And he so weak, so grateful for the sight
Of aught to drive his misery away—
That with a shuddering pity my heart bled,
And seemed rebuked for all its easy years.
Down next his own I softly bowed my head
And wept for him; his tears became my tears.

AFFAIRS in Mexico are rapidly approaching a crisis. Huerta, the dictator, went into hiding on November 14 for a whole day, and could not be found even by the members of his cabinet. It was believed that he took this step to avoid replying to the final communication from John Lind, as the latter was about to leave the capital for Vera Cruz; but it was also rumored that he was a temporary prisoner in the house of General Aureliano Blanquet, his minister of war, who had lately opposed his policy and whom he suspected of plotting a revolt in the army. Señor Aldape, another cabinet member who disagreed with Huerta, was forced to resign the portfolio of the interior and left the country suddenly, ostensibly on a mission to France. Before leaving, he is said to have revealed a cabinet plot, headed by Señor Moheno, minister of foreign affairs, to get rid of Huerta.

Next day, November 15, the dictator again emerged into public view for a brief space. He announced to his intimates his determination to keep up the fight.

"I shall not quit," he declared. "I shall continue just as I have been doing to bring about the pacification of the country and to fulfil my pledges made on taking office."

The new Congress met the same day, but it was a moribund affair. The Senate organized temporarily, but there was not a quorum in the chamber of deputies and no organization could be effected on the first day, but was carried out later. None of the Catholic senators were present, and their absence was regarded as evidence that the Roman Church had concluded to desert the dictator—a significant indication that they regarded the drama as drawing to a close.

In the capital itself there was a feeling verging on panic. The newspapers were rigidly censored and dared not print anything to reveal the true situation. But the capital had already learned of the capture of Ciudad Juarez by General Pancho Villa on the 15th, and it was widely rumored that the Constitutionalists had taken the cities of Chihuahua, Guaymas and Victoria, the capital of Tamaulipas, and that Tuxpan, too, had surrendered. These were heavy blows to the Federal cause, and the news stirred up fears of a revolt among the garrison of four thousand Federals in the capital itself. Everywhere were indications that the power of Huerta was soon to be broken.

Some time during the night of November 17 the dictator again disappeared, and it was learned that, in fear of his life at the hands of his former associates, he had fled to the castle of Chapultepec, on the outskirts of the capital, where he had shut himself up in the fortress, seeing only those of his ministers whom he still trusted.

On November 17 a rumor was current in Mexico City that the United States would begin a blockade of Mexican ports within three days. This news, it was said in a despatch to the New York Herald, was told by the German minister, Admiral von Heintze, to a number of German merchants and business men, and he gave them instructions for the purpose of getting their shipments through the blockade, if possible. It was added that seventeen American warships would be available for shutting up the ports. No confirmation of the rumor could be obtained in Washington, nor was there any intimation of a change in the policy thus far followed of waiting on events. Secretary Daniels of the Navy Department states that we have seven battleships, four cruisers, three gunboats and a force of seven thousand marines and sailors at available points on the two coasts of Mexico fully prepared to protect American interests.

On November 17 and 18 intelligence reached the capital that a rebel force was menacing Orizaba, half way between Mexico City and the coast. As it lies on the railroad leading to Vera Cruz, it was feared that communication with that port would be interrupted and that the foreigners in Mexico City would be bottled up and unable to leave. Immediately there was an increased demand for transportation. Trainloads of Americans and other foreigners reached Vera Cruz from the capital on the 18th, some of them being booked to sail for the United States on the steamship Morro Castle on the 20th, but the majority intending to remain at Vera Cruz awaiting developments. Serious apprehension was felt for the fate of those Americans in the interior who had not been able to reach the coast, and there were rumors of several parties being in danger from insurgent troops, although no reliable news of any outbreak was received. News of the capture of Ciudad Victoria in Tamaulipas, where the entire garrison of six hundred was killed by the Constitutionalists, prisoners included, did not serve to allay apprehension.

Dr. William Bayard Hale, President Wilson's agent, on November 18 was reported to be in communication with the members of the Carranza cabinet, and it was learned that the latter had decided to demand recognition from our government before opening any negotiations. The Carranzists have assumed a new attitude since the capture of Juarez, and now seem confident of ultimate success. The recent victories have inspired them with renewed courage.

The general situation on November 20 may be stated briefly thus: Secretary Bryan gave an absolute denial to the rumors of an intended blockade of Mexican seaports. Huerta was still in an attitude of defiance, and was attempting to hurriedly raise an army of 150,000 troops, in anticipation of intervention. Conscription was going on at a lively rate in the capital. There was apparently no change in the attitude or policy of the Washington government, which seemed to be satisfied with the progress of events. Our chargé d'affaires, O'Shaughnessy, was still at his post in Mexico City. There was no evidence of any anti-American demonstration, although the whole population was in a condition of excitement. From some unknown source, Huerta had secured one million pesos to pay his troops in the north and the government employees in the capital. A shipment of 15,000 rifles was daily expected by the Federals at Vera Cruz.

General Notes

—ACCORDING TO THE postoffice reports, the first year of the parcel post yielded a profit of $30,000,000. These are round figures, of course; but even when all allowances are made, the experiment will be shown to be a magnificent success.

—AN EARTHQUAKE overthrew the city of Abancay, Peru, on November 7, killing more than two hundred persons and rendering thousands homeless. Abancay is an important sugar center with a population of 3,000.

—SECRETARY LANE of the Interior Department has asked the President to withdraw certain lands for the proposed Denver Mountain Park, Colorado, pending consideration by Congress of a bill for the creation of the park. The area covered by this withdrawal is over 34,000 acres, in a region of broken land, rocky in character and having many canyons. Denver will inclose the tract, if ceded to it for park purposes, and make it one of the attractions of the city

FOR SOULS IN HEATHEN LANDS

FORTY-FOURTH ANNUAL SESSION, WOMAN'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY, METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, TOPEKA, KAN., OCTOBER 29 TO NOVEMBER 5, 1913

ONE of the notable forces at work for the spread of Christianity in the out-of-the-way places of the earth is the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. From October 29 to November 5 a great body of delegates met daily in the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Topeka, Kan. Morning, afternoon, and evening the large building was crowded. Inspiring addresses filled the hours. Bishops, ministers, delegates and missionaries in turn presented the different sides of the work that this society maintains in twenty-seven foreign countries. Day after day the Topeka Methodist ladies, aided by seven churches of other denominations, hospitably entertained the visitors, who will always have the pleasantest recollections of the Forty-fourth General Executive Meeting of the organization.

Foremost in the work of the society were the president, Mrs. W. F. McDowell; the vice-president, Mrs. A. W. Patten; Mrs. J. M. Cornell, secretary; the Pacific Coast secretaries, Mrs. A. N. Fisher and Mrs. S. F. Johnson; and the chairman of the local courtesy committee, Mrs. Hiram Imboden. Half a hundred missionaries home on furlough were in attendance, and about an equal number of new doctors, nurses, evangelists, and teachers, who are to help in spreading the Gospel and healing the sick in the far-away corners of the earth. The missionary addresses made a deep impression and showed what a drop in the bucket is the actual work done in proportion to the great need. Every school needed more teachers; every hospital more doctors and nurses; every church more helpers; and every mission more buildings. For an hour each afternoon, missionaries in costume gave illustrations of actual scenes connected with mission life. No one could be at these meetings without being deeply impressed with three things, viz.: The joy that comes to every one who devotes his or her life to doing good to others; the rich blessing God is pouring out on the efforts of the workers in the foreign field, and the great need everywhere for more workers.

WHERE IS SILVIO PELLICO'S BIBLE?

BY REV. ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, D.D., VENICE

"WHERE is Silvio Pellico's Bible?" is a question which is being asked by many Italians at the present time, and to give it greater publicity the newspapers have taken it up. These generally give a short description of the book, and the use Silvio Pellico made of it; they then trace the various hands through which it passed after his death up to its disappearance some thirty or forty years ago, and end by asking: "Where now is Silvio Pellico's Bible? If any of our readers can tell us, all Italy will be grateful."

Silvio Pellico, as many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may know, obtained a European reputation through the publication in 1833 of his book, Le Mie Prigioni (My Prisons). Previous to that publication he was known and loved throughout Italy as a poet and a patriot, especially as a writer of tragedies. Indeed his Francesco da Rimini, produced on the stage in Milan by the celebrated tragedian, Carlotta Marchionni, made his name known beyond the bounds of Italy. Like Cavour, Silvio Pellico was a native of what Mr. Gladstone called "gallant little Piedmont," having been born at Saluzzo, some forty-two miles south of Turin, on June 24, 1788. He was educated at Pinerolo, and doubtless his Waldensian surroundings influenced him in favor of civil and religious liberty, just as Cavour was influenced by the Protestant influences which surrounded him in his mother's family at Geneva. But in any case, the idea of national freedom and of national unity have been implanted in the hearts of the Italians everywhere, and especially in Piedmont, which was destined to lead in the conflict, and ultimately to give to Italy its royal house and constitutional government.

Silvio Pellico went to Lyons in his sixteenth year, where he remained four years in the house of a rich cousin, worthy, he tells us, of his riches. At Lyons he studied French, and when in 1818 he returned to Italy and settled in Milan, he was appointed professor of French in one of the colleges, and also tutor to the two sons of Count Porro. Count Porro's house was a great literary center, not only for Italian authors, such as Monti and Foscolo, but for distinguished travelers from all lands. Here he met Lord Byron, Lord Brougham, Hobhouse, Mme. de Stael, Schlegel, Davis and others. Here too he started with others the newspaper Il Conciliatore in order to educate the people, and prepare them for the exercise of civil and religious liberty. But Austria, which then ruled absolutely in Lombardy, as in Venetia and in other parts of Italy, wanted, as the emperor said, "Obedient subjects, not learned men." The newspaper was suppressed, and Silvio Pellico was arrested and conducted to the prison of Santa Margherita.

This was, as he tells us in the opening sentence of Le Mie Prigioni on Friday, October 13, 1820, at three o'clock in the afternoon. It was now we first hear of his Bible. "This divine Book," he says, "I had always loved much, even when I appeared to myself to be skeptical, but now I began to study it with more reverence. In spite of my good intentions, however, my mind often wandered to other things, and I understood little. Gradually, however, I was able to concentrate my attention, and I always enjoyed it the more." At first he felt his solitary imprisonment terribly, but, he says, "remembering that God is ever near me, am I not in the best of company?"

Gradually he became calm and peaceful and was able even to sing. Santa Margherita was the first of Silvio Pellico's prisons, and here he lay four months and a week. Then on the 18th of February, 1821, he was aroused at midnight, hustled into a carriage and driven, without a stop, except to change the horses, to Venice. He was there taken to the doge's palace, and conducted up many stairs to the piombi (the leads). Travelers are shown, when visiting the doge's palace, the pozzi; that is, the prisons which are under the rooms of state, but not, as some people imagine, under the level of the surrounding water. There are two ranges of them, one above the other, and the lower range is well above the reach of the highest ordinary spring tide. But the piombi travelers do not see. There are, or rather were, prisons under the leaden roof of the palace. They have all been dismantled by the Italian Government, excepting one, which is preserved to show what they were like. Under Austria they were always full of political prisoners, as a rule the very choice of Italian men. Silvio Pellico was assigned one with a large, strongly barred window, from which he could see the domes of St. Mark's Church, the Campanile, the central court of the palace, and a piece of the piazza.

The winter was extraordinarily mild, and as spring came the heat under the leads became great, and in summer unbearable. He was roasted with the heat and devoured by mosquitoes. His faith failed him and he ceased to read his Bible. By a strange reaction, whilst passing sleepless nights, he tried to be cheerful by day. He sang for hours with "a cheerfulness barren of all good sentiment." He cracked jokes with the jailer and two children who often came with him to Silvio's cell. This lasted but six or seven days, he tells us, when a child was used to bring him to his senses. This was one of the jailer's boys, who, caressing Silvio (for everybody loved him), said, pointing to the Bible:

"Since you ceased to read that bad book, you are no longer melancholy, it seems to me."

"Do you think so?" Silvio said. He then got his Bible, removed the dust from it with his handkerchief, and, laying it open on a chair, went down on his knees before it.

The first words which met his eyes were these: "Then said he to his disciples, It is impossible but that offenses will come; but woe unto him through whom they come! It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and he cast into the sea than that he should offend one of these little ones." (Luke 17: 1, 2.)

For an hour Silvio Pellico remained in that position, reading, praying and weeping, and when he rose peace had once more entered his heart, and he said: "My misfortunes, the torments of my examinations, even the death sentence that threatens me, seem now small matters. I rejoice to suffer, because it gives me occasion to fulfil my duty and to obey the Lord."

After eleven months spent in the Piombi prisons, Silvio Pellico was taken on January 11, 1822, to the island of San Michele, which lies to the north of Venice. Here there was a monastery which the Austrians had turned into a prison for political offenders. Part of the monastery still stands, and the church connected with it, which is visited by strangers in order to see the last resting-place of Fra Paolo Sarpi, who was buried in the atrium. Silvio Pellico's prison here, like that in the piombi of the doge's palace, no longer exists, but we can tell exactly from his descriptions of it where it was situated. Shortly after his imprisonment here he was informed that the judges had come to a

This Christmas and Next

HOW much happiness is there in the world? How much should there be? How much could there be? How much shall there be? Joy-makers! That is what the world needs. And Christmas is the festival of the joy-makers. It is a time when their principles are recognized as correct.

But here's a plan. Not a new one, only this time let's do it, instead of acknowledging that it ought to be done. Christmas day means that for certain hours we adopt the policy of making other people glad. Why not do that same thing the day after Christmas? Why not the day after that? Why not every day till Christmas comes again?

Do you ever let yourself stop to think of the actual misery that is in the world? Just south of us a nation is torn by civil war. Have you seen any of the pitiful pictures of those battlefields and battle streets? The Balkan horrors are still fresh in our minds. These are only isolated and intensified illustrations of the pain and woe that men and women and children are bearing. There is the distress of poverty, of illness, of unemployment, of oppressive employment, of punishments for crime—and a hundred other forms. The task is to lessen the misery and increase the joy.

In that task everybody can help. Everybody must help. The wrongs that bring misery must be righted; the vices that bring misery must be uprooted; the people who make misery must be won to the other side; the people who are miserable must be made glad.

There is gladness enough to go round. There are enough Christmas trees for every home to have one. There are enough dollars to make sure that every child shall find his Christmas stocking filled. There is enough work so that every man shall have a job—the Christmas gift thousands of men would choose first of all. There is enough love in God's heart to fill every life with sunshine. There is enough power of love in the lives of the good to overthrow the works of hate.

But we have not even yet touched upon the real message of Christmas. Christmas is Christ's day. It means all that we have been saying, and then much more. It means that God gave Christ to the world to save it. It means that Christ has power to turn misery-makers into joy-makers, to turn hate into love, to turn sorrow into gladness. It means that the quickest and surest way to make the world a place of joy is to bring the world to him.

One last word: Do not be overwhelmed by the size of the task. A moment ago we were trying to visualize the world's vast sorrow. Does our life seem so small that it is hard to believe we can do anything to lessen appreciably the grief and increase the joy? Then you have forgotten the real story of Christmas. What could be weaker than a baby lying in the straw? Yet that baby has wrought the miracle of love and hope and gladness in so many lives that the mind staggers at the thought of trying to count them. One by one they have been made glad; one by one they have been brought over from the sorrow-makers to the joy-makers; one by one they have been enlisted in the cause of putting down injustice and hate and giving kindness and justice sway. They have been reached, one by one; their minutes have been lived one by one; their tasks done one by one.

Think of the thousands of waking minutes from now till next Christmas. Will you fill them all with kindness and gladness? Shall we not all do it? Come! Make earth a gladder place before Christmas comes again.

The Perils of the Sea

ANOTHER splendid triumph has been scored by the wireless in the rescue of the passengers from the burning steamer Balmes in mid-Atlantic. Her faint call of "S O S" sent out at a venture when her case seemed hopeless, was caught by the Pannonia, 180 miles away, and within eighteen hours her passengers, 103 in number, were transferred in safety to the rescuing vessel. Deeds of heroism and courage were done that deserve the highest praise, but the fact remains that, but for the wireless, another disaster might have been added to the long list of unexplained ocean mysteries. One need only recall the tragedies of the Titanic and the Volturno, both still fresh in the public mind, to appreciate the value of Marconi's invention. It has proved a blessing to those who "go down to the sea in ships," not only minimizing the perils of ocean travel, but giving practical assurance of help when most needed. The time may yet come when it will be possible to establish wireless stations along all the lines of ocean travel.

Filipino Slavery Abolished

SOONER than we expected, but none the less welcome, comes the news that the Filipino National Assembly has passed a law for the abolition of slavery in every form throughout the archipelago. This is a complete reversal of the assembly's attitude, which a year ago was decidedly opposed to such legislation on the ground that slavery did not actually exist, and claiming that even if it did in isolated cases, these could be dealt with under the old Spanish laws. Now, however, the evidence unearthed by the American investigators has convinced the native body of legislators of the advisability of admitting conditions which they had believed were effectually hidden, and they have enacted a sweeping statute doing away with it forever. This is a great triumph for the American administration, and more especially for Mr. Worcester and his associates, who were instrumental in bringing all the truth concerning secret slavery and peonage to light. It should not be difficult for the new government to see to it that the anti-slavery law is honestly enforced, and that the great principle, which declares that wherever the American flag floats slavery shall cease, finds full practical expression among the races of the archipelago.

The Gift of Song

THERE are few endowments which God and nature bestow that are to be compared with the gift of a beautiful voice. In the old days, those who were chosen to sing the sacred songs of the people were duly consecrated with this injunction: "See that thou believest in thy heart what thou singest with thy mouth, and approve in thy works what thou believest in thy heart." This world is full of beautiful voices, but only too few of them are so consecrated. The great gift which lifts its possessor to an enviable altitude, the admiration of multitudes, is too often degraded. There passed away in London a few days ago a woman, whose extraordinary musical talents have been famous on two continents. She was Mathilde de Castrone Marchesi, once a famous singer and afterward a teacher of songbirds for nearly half a century. She was eighty-seven years old, had sung and taught for two generations, and among her friends she included some of the greatest names in music; Rossini, Meyerbeer, Gounod, Massenet, Rubenstein and others. Under her skilful tuition many famous divas have been developed and hundreds of American women who reached eminence as vocalists lovingly called her "mother." It was Marchesi's own claim that she had never sung or taught a vulgar song; she had kept her great talent pure and bright throughout her long career and by her example had unconsciously influenced those whom she trained. It was Ruskin who said that "all great song has been sincere song." In a very positive sense the song and the singer are one, and unless the heart of the singer be in the work and the ideals kept pure and high, the greatest satisfaction that can come from such a gift will never be realized.

The "Money-Clock" Campaign

EDUCATING the public by means of a well-organized financial campaign is one of the cardinal principles in Y. M. C. A. management. Men and women to-day do not give liberally to a cause until they have satisfied themselves of its merits. The experience of this organization is that every such well-conducted campaign secures the permanent interest of a large percentage of the community. The success of the associations in their financial campaigns remarkably emphasizes the value of belief in one's work. They say to the community: "You need us. We take your young men and your young women off the street and out of questionable pleasures and idleness and teach them that their bodies are God-given, their minds divine, and their spiritual natures supreme. We train them for efficient Christian citizenship in business and in the home. We teach them to spend their money and their time on self-improvement, and you, who represent society at large, get the benefit."

The united associations' campaign to secure a $4,000,000 expense fund in New York City was conducted chiefly amongst the most prosperous classes, and the leaders were themselves men and women of wealth and influence. The associations are to be congratulated upon the solid support received from that element of the population, and the American public is to be congratulated upon the encouraging fact that so genuine an interest is taken in Christian activities by a class of people too often undeservedly denounced as worldly and selfish. In seeking great gifts from a large number of wealthy people, the associations are not actuated by mercenary motives, but rather are working in the interests of the whole community. They do wisely in laying the foundation of future support in the hearts of those who can afford to give liberally. But the campaign by no means passed over the givers of small amounts, and the leaders freely admitted that despite the showing of huge donations, success depended largely upon the voluntary gifts of thousands whose names would never be known except to the treasurer's staff. In its methods, its faith and its results, the campaign may be studied to advantage by other Christian bodies. It strikes a new note in the work of financing great religious and philanthropic movements and shows what can be accomplished by united enthusiastic effort, combined with thorough system.

Nobel Prize for Hindu

THE Nobel prize for literature was on November 13 awarded to the Hindu poet, Rabindranath Tagore. This is the first time that this prize, worth $40,000, has ever been given to anybody but a white person.

The poet was born of high family in 1860. In a retreat in the snow-crowned Himalayas, so near to Nature in her most glorious forms, Tagore learned English, Sanskrit, Bengali, and studied the sciences of botany and astronomy. At the age of seventeen he was taken to Europe and there perfected his knowledge of English and acquired a splendid prose style which few have equaled in India. He is a man of charming personality with flowing hair, unfurrowed forehead, bright black eyes, well-chiseled nose, firm chin, sweet voice, pleasant smile, keen sense of humor, and inborn refinement. A poet primarily, he is singularly versatile in his abilities. He is a philosopher, a patriotic leader, a historian, a singer and musical composer, and an actor of distinguished rank. But he is, above all, the poet, the poet of love, and this fact won for him the Nobel prize. From his poem, "The Infinite Love," we quote two stanzas:

I have ever loved thee in a hundred forms and times,
age after age, in birth following birth,
the chain of songs that my fond heart did weave
you graciously didst take round thy neck,
age after age, in birth following birth.

The two have come floating by the twin currents of love that well up from the inmost heart of the Beginningless.
The two have played in the lives of myriad lovers,
tearful solitude of sorrow,
tremendous shyness of sweet union, old, old love ever renewing its life.

We do not have to adopt the pantheism, the transmigration of souls, the Nirvana of the prize poet to appreciate his exalted poetical genius, or the profound influence he has upon the mind and heart of his nation. No contention could be more unfair than that Christianity, the true religion, has a monopoly on the intellect of the world. What a debt of gratitude modern literature owes to the works of the heathen poets, to the songs of Homer, Virgil, Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, and the rest! In the cultivation of his intellect and his literary style, Paul studied the heathen poets and made this quotation from one of them in his address on Mars Hill:

For in him we live, and move, and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring. (Acts 17: 28.)

Dies Saving Her Children

MRS. PAULINE F. GILL of Boston Road, Larchmont, New York, who was run down by an automobile while saving her two children from being hit by the same car the other day, died four days after in the New Rochelle Hospital. Her chest was crushed and her skull fractured. She was visiting in New Rochelle with her two children, Helen, fifteen years old, and John, twelve. As she was crossing the street to take a trolley car, an automobile bore down upon them. She pushed both of the children out of the path, but was not able to get herself out of the way quickly enough and was fatally injured. In saving the children she had to throw them against the street car on the other side, which bruised them so seriously that they had to be taken with the mother in the ambulance to the hospital. The children had no bones broken and will recover soon. We have here the ever-recurring story of a mother's devotion to her children, and her heroism in freely giving up her life in their behalf. Life so often begins in the tragedy of the mother giving up her life for her babe. Life is one continuous story of mother's toil for the children, and her sacrifice in their behalf. She will subsist on half food, or even starve herself, to let them have something to eat. She will go scantily clad and invite pneumonia to keep the little feet and bodies of her darlings warm. The dear woman who pushed her children to safety and lost her own life only did more hurriedly what many mothers are doing gradually and insensibly, but as surely—literally sacrificing health and life for their little ones. Can there be anything so near paradise in this world as a mother's love? And yet above this is the love of our heavenly Father for his children.

When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up. (Ps. 27: 10.)

Bryn Mawr's Superwoman Temple

THE first class of twenty girls from ten to twelve years of age has been started on the road to a perfect womanhood at the Phœbe Anne Thorne Open Air Model School at Bryn Mawr College. The girls are provided with an open-air schoolroom, open-air sleeping porches, wholesome food and plenty of sleep and vigorous exercise on the athletic field. They will be "superwomen" not only in body, but in mind also. The director of the model school and her associates, professor of education at the college, have made a special study of the best methods of teaching, not only in this country but in England, Germany, France and Italy also. The graduates of this school are expected to read Latin, French and German at sight, to solve original problems in geometry and algebra, to write good compositions, to draw and paint appropriate pictures and to excel in musical composition and execution. The children wear garments like those of an Eskimo. Most careful provision has been made for the cultivation of the character and the graces of Christian womanhood. Those who are responsible for the experiment insist that their open-air school, whose course will last seven years, will furnish the best specimens of womanhood in the United States. The place that beautiful cultivated womanhood has in the foundation of the home, the church and the state is thus illustrated:

Heroes and Heroines Honored

CARNEGIE medals of honor were recently awarded to John H. Sennopt, Michael E. Walsh, Dora Hyatt, Regina A. Ford, and Helen D. York. All had saved persons from drowning. John Hopewell of Pond Point Beach fell from a raft into an angry sea and threw up his hands and cried for help, as he was unable to swim and was going down to death. Frank Higgins started for the drowning man and made his way with him partly toward the shore when Hopewell grabbed him about the neck and both were drowning. Miss Helen D. York, a young lady of small stature, seeing the peril, swam hurriedly to the man and succeeded in saving both. After two hours' work Hopewell was resuscitated. The girl did not consider she had done any heroic thing, and was astonished to find herself catalogued in the roll of honor for heroism in this country. The other instances displayed the same determination to save others at the risk of their own lives. About the time these persons were honored, two hundred New York women gave a reception to a shaggy-haired Newfoundland dog named Teddy and awarded him a large bronze medal for having leaped into the Hudson River and saved the lives of two little children. The act of the dog was beautiful; that of the women in providing the party and decoration for him seems almost a waste of time and money, as he did not know any more about such a performance than did the brass medal that hung about his neck. Those receiving the Carnegie medals consciously saved precious lives, knowing they were running the risk of losing their own. They incarnated the heroism of the apostle:

Neither count I my life dear unto myself. (Acts 20: 24.)

Churchill Preaches Sermon

WINSTON CHURCHILL, the author, occupied the pulpit of the Trinity Episcopal Church in San Francisco Sunday morning, November 16, in which he expounded themes of philosophy and religion of intense and general interest. In the course of his remarks he emphasized the religion of service in these words: "The motive of our present civilization, based on a scientific theory which we are coming to see is false when applied to humanity—the survival of the fittest, the piling up of property, the exploitation of our fellow man—is slowly but surely giving way to the motive which is Christ's own—that of service. We are beginning to realize that we are our brothers' keepers." Social service so emphasized in our time is one-half of the Christian religion. It must not be made a substitute for the other half—that of vital relationship to God and an intense personal love for Christ. Winston Churchill preached the gospel of service which Paul proclaimed when he said:

For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake. (II Cor. 4: 5.)

Judge Paid Prisoner's Fine

WILLIAM RHODES of Seaford, Long Island, was one of three hunters fined the other day for shooting ducks from a blind. Justice Raisig, himself an enthusiastic sportsman, who was in the act of imposing the fine, said to Rhodes: "Your face seems familiar to me; where have I met you?" The man answered: "Some years ago I was your guide for two seasons." "Sure enough," said the judge, "and a good guide." He continued: "Rhodes, I do not want to fine you, and yet I must do my duty. But I will pay your fine out of my own pocket." And the justice gave the man back his ten dollars, and made out his own personal check to the order of the town of Hempstead in place of it. Christ the Judge pays the price of our transgression and pleads with the Father for our release on the ground that he has suffered the penalty in our behalf.

If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world. (John 2: 1, 2.)
